The Abstract contained an error:

In the original statement “There were significant average gender differences in paternalism (boys higher), future family hopes (girls higher), future careers associated with women (girls higher), and most future careers associated with men (boys higher); we found no significant gender difference in business/law career interest.”, the findings were incorrectly described. It should have been: “There were significant average gender differences in paternalism (boys higher), future careers associated with women (girls higher), and most future careers associated with men (boys higher); we found no significant gender differences in future family hopes and in business/law career interest.”

The authors regret this error.
