

About the Authors

Lee Clarke's most recent book is Mission Improbable: Using Fantasy Documents to Tame Disaster, published by the University of Chicago Press. He is currently writing a book about the idea of worst cases.

Debra Gimlin received her Ph.D. from the State University of New York, Stony Brook in 1996. In addition to her work on computing and organizations, her graduate work focused on the sociology of culture and the sociology of gender. Her dissertation, Body work: The business of beauty in women's lives, will be published this year by the University of California Press. Dr. Gimlin is now Senior Project Director at Vs, Inc.; a research and consulting firm in Philadelphia. Her current activities include work on women's health, intraorganizational relations, and internet marketing.

Erich Goode is visiting professor in the Department of Criminology and Criminal Justice at the University of Maryland at College Park. He has taught at Columbia University, New York University, the University of North Carolina at Chapel Hill, the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, and State University of New York at Stony Brook. Dr. Goode received his Ph.D. in sociology from Columbia University. His recent books include Drugs in American Society (McGraw-Hill, 5th ed., 1999), Deviant Behavior (Prentice-Hall, 6th ed., 2001), Moral Panics: The Social Construction of Deviance (with Nachman Ben-Yehuda, Blackwell, 1994), Between Politics and Reason: The Drug Legalization Debate (St. Martin's Press, 1997), and Paranormal Beliefs: A Sociological Introduction (Waveland Press, 2000).

Shin-Kap Han is Assistant Professor of Sociology at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign. His areas of interest include economic sociology, organizations, networks, and careers. Currently, he is working on two projects: one on the dynamics of coupled careers and the other on the network structure of the decision-making process in the U.S. Supreme Court. He has recently published in the American Journal of Sociology, the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, and Social Networks.

Grace Kao is Assistant Professor Sociology the University of Pennsylvania. She is also affiliated with the Population Studies Center and the Asian American Studies Program. Currently, she is a National Academy of Education/Spencer Foundation Post-Doctoral Fellow; under this project, she is examining how family functioning differs between immigrant families and nonimmigrant families using NELS:88. In addition, she is examining the extent and determinants of interracial friendships and romantic relationships among youth (in collaboration with Dr. Kara Joyner, McGill University) using Add Health.

Christine Lindquist is a research health analyst at Research Triangle Institute. She received her Ph.D. in medical sociology from the University of Alabama at Birmingham in 1997, and completed a postdoctoral fellowship in nutrition. Her research interests in the area of criminology include physical and mental health among incarcerated populations, alternative treatment for drug-involved criminal offenders, and school violence prevention. She is currently involved in a research project determining the role of drug courts to reduce recidivism and alcohol and drug use. In addition, she is participating in a national evaluation of school violence prevention programs.

Joan E. Manley is Assistant Professor of Sociology at Louisiana State University. Her research interests include the organization of work and the influence of complex organizations, stratification, and the economy on professional work arrangements and access to jobs. Specific interests include the effect of organizational change and social policy on health care organizations; the perpetuation of gender, race, and class stratification; and the contribution of expert knowledge to organizational legitimacy and professional work arrangements. She is currently investigating the growth and impact of accreditation, credentialing, and performance measurement on occupations and organizations.

James Rule is Professor of Sociology at the State University of New York, Stony Brook. He has written widely on matters related to technology, especially information technology and privacy. He is beginning a new cross-national study of success and failure in privacy protection policy. He is also author of works on cumulation in social thought, most recently, Theory and Progress in Social Science (Cambridge University Press, 1997). His present article was largely developed during his recent year as Visiting Scholar at the Russell Sage Foundation.

Sylvia Sievers is a doctoral student in sociology at the State University of New York, Stony Brook. In addition to her work on information technology, she is engaged in the study of deviant behavior, public policy, social movements, and epidemiology. She has published in the American Journal of Psychiatry and is currently collaborating in a project funded by the National Institute of Mental Health examining relations between trauma exposure and psychiatric illness.

Guobin Yang is Assistant Professor of Sociology the University of Hawaii-Manoa. He recently received his Ph.D. in sociology from New York University. His dissertation documents the transformation of identity among China's Red Guard generation from 1966 to 1999. He also received a Ph.D. in English literature from Beijing Foreign Studies University in 1993. That dissertation is an annotated English translation of Wenxin diaolong, a classic of Chinese literary criticism. He is now conducting a comparative study of the public discourse of nationalism in China at the beginning and end of the twentieth century.