Many people have supported the writing of this book. My teachers at Gonzaga University first introduced me to theology as an academic discipline, and my colleagues and friends at Boston College and the University of San Diego—faculty, staff, and administration—have consistently cheered me on. I am especially grateful to Boston College for funding this research in its early stages, and to the University of San Diego for the research grants that reduced my teaching load for two semesters, enabling me to complete the book in a timely manner.

Any theological merit in this work is due largely to M. Shawn Copeland’s gracious and conscientious mentoring, which I have been fortunate to experience not only through her scholarly work but also personally. Her input during the initial development of these ideas was invaluable. While I will always have much to learn, both as a theologian and as a white person in the United States, Professor Copeland has generously pointed me in the right direction. More broadly, the encouragement of colleagues who are also striving toward antiracism means much more to me than I can say.

I am tremendously grateful to Sarah Azaransky for suggesting that we form a writing group and for meeting faithfully to set goals and celebrate progress; the process would have been much more lonely and stressful without her. In addition, she, Shawn Copeland, Mary Doak, Belinda Lum, Emily Reimer-Barry, Tracy Tiemeier, and Matt Watkins read and commented on drafts of various chapters. I thank them for improving the argument, and I take responsibility for the errors and gaps that remain.

My family and friends have helped me enormously. My parents, Betty and Jerry Teel, instilled in me a solid moral foundation from which serious questions about justice and peace became possible, and they supported my theological aspirations even when they worried that I would never leave school and get a “real” job. Since I did so, my family, neighbors, and friends have continued to keep me sane. I have also been sustained by the welcome extended to me in my church communities. And to Sarah Moriarty, my deepest gratitude for creating (on short notice) the exquisite drawing that expresses the spirit of the book so beautifully.

Finally, completing Racism and the Image of God would have been far more tedious without the companionship of my family—Matt, Madeline, and Gabriel. They believe in my efforts, struggle with me on the journey toward antiracism, and bring me joy every day. To them I lovingly dedicate this book.
