why does Shakespeare want to write drama?

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

Our perpetual gratitude, first, to Hugh Richmond, our peer reviewer, and to Brigitte Shull, Jo Roberts, and the staff at Palgrave Macmillan, who relieved us of the labors of slaving over our manuscript by determining that it was ready for print. June Schlueter deserves many blessings as well for playing the role of the Grim Ripper in helping us to meet Palgrave's word limit (and for offering her insights on the book's numerous early drafts). For critiquing the entire manuscript from the perspective of his many years on stage and from his recent experience as a Theatre Panelist for London's Olivier Awards, we owe much to Frederick Pyne. Thanks, too, to all of those kind friends who suggested improvements in individual chapters—Sarah Stanton, Heather Dubrow, Hugh Boulton, and our array of Davids—David Kastan, David Landman, David Casagrande. Their early challenges helped us to refine our arguments. Production details were kindly overseen by Richard Bellis and Rohini Krishnan, and, at the perfect moment, Betsy Kruger supplied us, in reproducible digital form, with the Motley image that graces our cover.

Debts to our predecessors whose work on Richard III made our task easier have been acknowledged in the Notes; however, Emrys Jones, Robert Turner, Chris Hassel, Peter Holland, and John Jowett deserve special notice in this regard, as does George M. Logan, whose timely publication of an excellent "reading edition" of The History of King Richard III made Sir Thomas More's work conveniently accessible. The works of Eric Voegelin, Maynard Mack, and Brian Vickers have also informed this study.

For financial assistance that allowed us to visit Shakespeare libraries in England and helped to underwrite the costs of writing and preparing the manuscript, we owe much to Fordham University, and for graciously awarding Charles the status of Visiting Scholar, thereby putting its libraries and computer facilities at our disposal, we extend thanks to Dartmouth College, where most of this book was written, and to Dartmouth's Peter Travis and Susan Bibeau. We are also grateful for the generosity of Eric Rosenberg and Michele Kolb, who provided our “home office” in New York City.

And let us not forget those who gave us needed encouragement as we prepared this book—Harry Keyishian, Mark Caldwell, Barbara Hanrahan, Matthew Frost, Ronnie Mulryne, and George Zournas.
