I am grateful to the Economic and Social Research Council for funding the project 'Twinship and the Negotiation of Social Identity in Britain' which forms the basis of this book. That project and this book would not have been possible without the participation of the twins, parents and siblings who took part. I am grateful to them for sharing their accounts with me and for making me welcome in their homes. All the names (apart from those of my own family) used in the book are pseudonyms, some chosen by the children themselves. I also want to thank TAMBA for helping me to locate some of the twins.

Thanks to my colleagues, friends and family who have supported me in writing this book. Allison for her enduring mentorship and encouragement, Hannah for her love, patience and companionship, Keith for his constant support and constant reading, Mum and Dad for their faith and always pushing me forward, Helen for her love, care and conversation, Sal for helping me to visualise my argument and offering guidance throughout the journey, and Tom for keeping the good ship a-sailing.
