A number of institutions and people have contributed to making this book possible. It started life as a research project on income inequality in Africa while I was at the University of Stellenbosch, South Africa. Subsequently, the Department of Politics at the University of Otago, New Zealand, provided a most congenial setting and financial means to expand the research focus to include developing countries in general. Most of the research for the book was done during my 2005 Alexander von Humboldt Fellowship at the Institute of Political Science, Tuebingen University, Germany. I benefited from diligent research assistance provided by Alex De Juan at Tuebingen, by Andrea Fromm at the University of Otago, and from discussions on poverty and inequality with students and staff of the University of Otago Research Cluster on Poverty, Inequality, and Development.

The book is dedicated to Dirkie, Marna, and Rudolph.
