Race, Law, and “The Chinese Puzzle” in Imperial Britain
Race, Law, and “The Chinese Puzzle” in Imperial Britain

Sascha Auerbach
For Allison and Colin
Contents

Acknowledgments xi
1 Introduction 1
2 “Chinese Labour” and the Imperial Dimensions of British Racial Discourse 15
3 The Dragon and Saint George, 1910–14 51
4 “Most Insidious Is the Oriental in the West”: Chinese and Britons in Wartime London 89
5 East (End) Meets West (End) 123
6 “This Plague Spot of the Metropolis,” 1919–21 151
7 Epilogue: The Ghosts of Chinatown 185
Notes 193
Bibliography 239
Index 257
Maps and Figures

Maps

1.1. London’s East End, 1883 5
1.2. Limehouse and the West India Docks, 1883 5

Figures

2.1. Chinese workers unloading tea from the Louden Castle on the East India Docks 17
2.2. “The Mongolian Octopus—His Grip on Australia,” 1886 26
3.1. “Chinese labour” replacing British miners, 1904 54
3.2. “Chinese labour” replacing British seamen, 1908 55
3.3. “In the Lamplight,” 1911 67
3.4. The Mystery of Dr. Fu Manchu movie promotional poster, 1923 79
6.2. Chinese children sitting on a stoop, Limehouse, c. 1928 166
6.3. A Chinese grocery store, Limehouse, c. 1930 167
7.1. Chee Kong Tong lodge and newspaper advertising placards, Limehouse, c. 1927 187
This book began as one aspect of a larger study of law and culture in modern Britain. Its completion would have been impossible without the generous contributions of colleagues, friends, and family. I would first like to thank Virginia Commonwealth University and Emory University for supporting my research. The awarding, by VCU, of a Career Scholarship Enhancement Grant at a crucial juncture in the project’s development was invaluable, and my special gratitude goes to Robert Holsworth, Catherine Ingrassia, and Bernard Moitt for their encouragement. In the VCU History Department, particular thanks are due to Wanda Clary, Leigh Anne Craig, Samantha Giles, John Kneebone, Gary Marquardt, Sarah Meacham, George Munro, Kathleen Murphy, Laura Ping, and Karen Rader. I am also grateful for the extraordinary hospitality shown to me by Bruce and Roberta Stover during my research trips to England.

It has been my great pleasure to work with a remarkable cohort of scholars who have guided me through every step of the research and writing process. Antoinette Burton, Anne Clendinning, Leigh Anne Craig, Paul Deslandes, Margot Finn, Dane Kennedy, Patrick McDevitt, Zachary Morgan, and Gail Savage all read portions of the manuscript and shared generously of their expertise. In England, Robert Bickers, Kelly Boyd, Janet Nelson, and Kirsty Reid kindly provided forums for me to present my work. In the United States and Canada, Leonard V. Smith and Stephen Heathorn did the same. Thanks are due for the comments and advice offered by the faculty and students who attended my papers and seminars at the Centre for the Study of Colonial and Post-Colonial Societies (University of Bristol), the Capitol Hill Gang, the Institute of Historical Research, McMaster University, the Mid-Atlantic Conference on British Studies, the North American Conference on British Studies, Oberlin College, the Pacific Coast Conference on British Studies, the University of Buffalo, and the Honors College of VCU. Along the way, I also received invaluable input and encouragement from Kathryn Amdur, Andrew August,
Anna Clark, Carolyn Conley, Dina Copelman, Anna Davin, Nadja Durbach, Heide Fehrenbach, Michael Fisher, Rick Jobs, Lara Kriegel, Philippa Levine, Matthew Payne, Susan Pennybacker, Elizabeth Prevost, Ellen Ross, Kevin Siena, John Soister, and Laura Tabili. Zane Bevan at the VCU Graphics Lab helped prepare the images for the book. Chris Chappell, Allison McElgunn, Rosemi Mederos, Henry Whitney and the other editors and staff at Palgrave Macmillan and Scribe have been terrific to work with, and I appreciate all the time and energy that they have devoted to bringing The Chinese Puzzle to fruition.

The helpful staffs of various archives and libraries in Britain and the United States patiently endured even my most relentless and obscure inquiries. I am particularly thankful to the staffs of the British Library, the Colindale Newspaper Library, the JUSTIS legal archive, the Library of Virginia, the London Metropolitan Archives, the National Archives, the Tower Hamlets Local History Library and Archive, and the Trades Union Congress Library of London Metropolitan University. The help provided by Kevin Farley and the staff of VCU’s James Branch Cabell Library was above and beyond the call of duty, as was that of Anne Benham and the staff of the Alderman Library at the University of Virginia.

To my friends, my appreciation for your patient support is unbounded. Just a few who deserve special mention are Cennydd Bowles, William Carrigan, Amy Enright, Larissa Smith Ferguson, Sabo Gil, Gianni Masotto, Darren Morris, Todd Mustard, Aaron and Renee Fichtelberg, Laura Sandy, and Godfrey Uzoigwe. To my family, who kept me going from the first word to the last—Mom, Dad, Adam, Martin, David, Jerry, Val, Maia, Abbie, and the Sprout—thank you for believing that all who wander are not lost.

My most profound gratitude goes to the three people who were, respectively, the finest mentor, the best friend, and the most loving partner anyone could wish for. Margot, Colin, and Allison, thanks for always being there, especially in the rough weather.