Acknowledgements

My debts are many, but my pleasures in acknowledging them even more. For support, my deepest thanks and love to Susan L. Smith, dear friend. Without her unflagging confidence in my work, constant urging, and institutional know-how, this book would remain forever in process. To Teresa Zackodnik, whose formidable acuity, intellectual engagement, tender heart, and sheer delight in writing and talking about writing, has kept me more buoyed than she would ever know. To Glenn Burger, friend of a lifetime, who always thinks I have something to say and is willing to listen. To the other members of my writing group, whose careful attention and gastronomic treats have made this a better book: Lesley Cormack, Judy Garber, Lois Harder and Daphne Read.

The University of Alberta has been a most congenial address for my research and teaching. Amongst the many, past and present, who make the Department of English and Film Studies a good place to head for each day: Jo-Ann Wallace, friend and past chair; Peter Sinnema, fellow Victorianist and talented carouser; Cecily Devereux, who keeps me on my toes imperialistically; Monica Flegel for spirited conversation and pet-care. My thanks, too, to the McCalla Research Professorship committee, whose award of one year's writing time finally brought this ship to berth, and to the University of Alberta's Humanities, Fine Arts and Social Sciences Research Fund for support of a research trip at a critical time. Thanks too to the Social Science and Humanities Research Council of Canada for support of a research project that, long ago, led me to Frances Power Cobbe.

More far-flung, Janice Schroeder, whose work on the Victorian feminist periodical press I have been privileged to learn from; Sally Mitchell for sharing her incomparable knowledge on matters Cobbe; to Steven Kruger, for inspiration; to Geraldine Brennan and Neil Littman for giving me a London home whenever I need one; to Joseph and Dorothy Hamilton, parents extraordinaire; and to David Doughan who guided a session of 'Suffrage City' conference-goers in song, and who, though he doesn't know it, helped me to know how committed I was to the history of feminism.

And finally, to the two people most important in my life. To Paul Brennan, my heart, for years of loving support, tea and sweet colloquy; and to MaryClare, my delight, who continues to wonder why her school once had separate entrances for boys and girls.

Earlier versions of Chapter 4, 'The Practice of Everyday Feminism,' Chapter 5, 'Making History with Frances Power Cobbe,' and Chapter 6, "'Crisis in Woman's History",' first appeared, respectively, in Victorian Periodicals Review, Victorian Studies, and Women's History Review. My thanks to Indiana University Press and Andrew H. Miller at Victorian Studies, Ann Heilmann, and the editors of Women's History Review and Victorian Periodicals Review.
