Writing a book is never the activity of a single individual. Knowledge is created through interaction between people. Even the author locked away in a garret relies on knowledge acquired, created and disseminated by others. Also, the act of writing becomes meaningless if no reader engages with the written words. But writing a book within an academic context has a further set of conditions that impact upon the author–reader relationship and place it on a more formal footing: the requirements of academia.

I wish to thank many unnamed people who have assisted me in the creation of this book: the people who have agreed to be interviewed; the students who have engaged with me in a mutual exchange of information in the teaching and learning relation; and colleagues who have shared their knowledge with me. However, there are individuals who have made specific contributions that I would like to acknowledge by giving my sincerest thanks: Marilyn Callahan for her invaluable support and feedback after reading the draft manuscript; my parents for the endless love and wisdom that saw me through the physical process of writing; my brothers and sisters for their emotional succour when I felt lost; and David and Nicholas for the love, wit and sympathy in responding to my many absences. Thank you all. Without your contributions, this book would have been much poorer.
