

Imaging Religion in Film

NEW APPROACHES TO RELIGION AND POWER

Series editor: Joerg Rieger

While the relationship of religion and power is a perennial topic, it only continues to grow in importance and scope in our increasingly globalized and diverse world. Religion, on a global scale, has openly joined power struggles, often in support of the powers that be. But at the same time, religion has made major contributions to resistance movements. In this context, current methods in the study of religion and theology have created a deeper awareness of the issue of power: Critical theory, cultural studies, postcolonial theory, subaltern studies, feminist theory, critical race theory, and working class studies are contributing to a new quality of study in the field. This series is a place for both studies of particular problems in the relation of religion and power as well as for more general interpretations of this relation. It undergirds the growing recognition that religion can no longer be studied without the study of power.

Series editor:

Joerg Rieger is Wendland-Cook Professor of Constructive Theology in the Perkins School of Theology at Southern Methodist University.

Titles:

No Longer the Same: Religious Others and the Liberation of Christian Theology

David R. Brockman

The Subject, Capitalism, and Religion: Horizons of Hope in Complex Societies

Jung Mo Sung

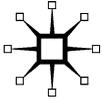

Imaging Religion in Film: The Politics of Nostalgia

M. Gail Hamner

Imaging Religion in Film
The Politics of Nostalgia

M. Gail Hamner

palgrave
macmillan

IMAGING RELIGION IN FILM

Copyright © M. Gail Hamner, 2011.

Softcover reprint of the hardcover 1st edition 2011 978-0-230-33986-6

All rights reserved.

First published in 2011 by

PALGRAVE MACMILLAN®

in the United States—a division of St. Martin's Press LLC, 175 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10010.

Where this book is distributed in the UK, Europe and the rest of the world, this is by Palgrave Macmillan, a division of Macmillan Publishers Limited, registered in England, company number 785998, of Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire RG21 6XS.

Palgrave Macmillan is the global academic imprint of the above companies and has companies and representatives throughout the world.

Palgrave® and Macmillan® are registered trademarks in the United States, the United Kingdom, Europe and other countries.

ISBN 978-1-349-34240-2

ISBN 978-1-137-01324-8 (eBook)

DOI 10.1057/9781137013248

Library of Congress Cataloging-in-Publication Data

Hamner, M. Gail, 1963—

Imaging religion in film : the politics of nostalgia / M. Gail Hamner.
p. cm.

1. Religion in motion pictures. 2. Motion pictures—Religious aspects.
3. Motion pictures—Moral and ethical aspects. 4. Nostalgia in motion pictures. I. Title.

PN1995.9.R4H36 2011

791.43'682—dc23

2011023757

A catalogue record of the book is available from the British Library.

Design by Newgen Imaging Systems (P) Ltd., Chennai, India.

First edition: December 2011

10 9 8 7 6 5 4 3 2 1

*This book is dedicated to my children:
Elena Claire Bingham Seth Daniel Bingham*

Contents

List of Images	ix
Preface: Film at the Intersection of Religion and Power	xi
Acknowledgements	xv
Introduction: Interpreting Religion and Film	1
Part I Film Study
1 Akira Kurosawa: “What Is a Thing?”; Posing the Religious in Dersu Uzala (1975)	35
2 Abbas Kiarostami: The Face of Modernity; Alienation and Transcendence in Taste of Cherry (1997)	63
3 Joel and Ethan Coen: Searching for a Way Out; Alienation and Intimacy in The Man Who Wasn't There (2001)	97
Part II Theoretical Reflections
4 Religious Realism	133
5 Concluding Thoughts	143
Notes	151
Bibliography	181
Index	191

Images

- | | | |
|-----|---|-----|
| 0.1 | (a) John Travolta as “family man” Sean Archer. | 6 |
| 0.2 | John Woo’s signature “doves,” this time as sea gulls at the feet of Troy (Travolta). | 7 |
| 0.3 | (a) Sean Archer (here played by Nicolas Cage) as the icon of “good,” with a white aura and flying gulls; (b) and Castor Troy (John Travolta) as the icon of “evil,” standing in relative darkness, with subdued gulls. Troy takes pleasure in mocking the poses of Christian icons. | 8 |
| 1.1 | As Donald Richie attests, Dersu Uzala does predominate in long shots and slow pans. | 49 |
| 1.2 | The mise-en-scène says it all: Dersu holds intimate conversation with the Captain, while the Chinese hermit, barely visible, sits in the doorway of his house. The tree branches individuate the three characters, and heighten the Chinese man’s isolation. | 57 |
| 1.3 | The sun, the moon, and the mediation of technology. | 60 |
| 2.1 | (a) Viewers see Mr Badii’s (Homayoun Ershadi) face for much of this film. (b) Only outside the city does the camera break out of the car in high-angled long shots. | 77 |
| 2.2 | The Turkish taxidermist (Abdol Hossein Bagheri). | 90 |
| 2.3 | A photograph gels temporality and signals transcendence. | 92 |
| 2.4 | “Playing car” (the children are uncredited in English). A brief glimpse at how to escape the entrapments of modernity. | 93 |
| 2.5 | (a) Badii’s car runs into a ditch. (b) Workers on the hill come running; laughing and talking with each other, they lift the car out of the ditch. A perfect picture of solidarity. | 94 |
| 3.1 | Frank (Michael Badalucco) expressing his animality. | 105 |

- 3.2 The intimacies of shaving. (a) Doris (Frances MacDormand) is about to ask Ed (Billy Bob Thornton) to shave her legs; (b) Ed watches a prison guard begin to shave his legs in preparation for his electrocution. In life Crane (Thornton) is in shadow; in death, he is illuminated, exposed. 114
- 3.3 Ed Crane (Billy Bob Thornton) gazes empty on a crucifix, bored by the church bingo game. 121
- 3.4 The subtle theme of alien presence: (a) The lawyer, Freddy Riedenschneider (Tony Shalhoub) stands in a circle of light that evokes Close Encounters of the Third Kind (Spielberg, 1977), and (b) an alien ship at the jailhouse, seen from Ed's point-of-view as he recounts how it feels to know when you will die. 124

Preface: Film at the Intersection of Religion and Power

In pedagogical terms, an ethical discourse needs to regard the relations of power, subject positions, and social practices it activates. This is an ethics of neither essentialism nor relativism.

—Henry Giroux

This is an unusual book about religion and film. Instead of diving immediately into recent blockbusters that image religious rituals, traditions, or characters, I argue that the interpretation of religion and film requires examination of the assumptions and connotations of “religion,” both in terms of its conceptual referents and in terms of its discursive (or disciplinary) (dis)connections to film studies. The question of how to interpret religion in film thus relies on the prior question of how to work in the subfield of religion and film. This interdisciplinary task involves a set of difficult hermeneutic maneuvers and compromises, which typically are occluded by that little word, “and,” because the discourses of religion studies and film studies assume fundamentally different ways of dealing with what Giroux calls “the relations of power, subject positions, and social practices.” A similar difficult dynamic shapes the scholarly subfields of “religion and popular culture,” “religion and critical theory,” and “religion and feminist theory.” In each case, the historical inertia of “religious studies” as a rather tame and proper examination of people’s beliefs and practices slams up against studies of how specific relations of power both constitute the “being” of subjects and groups and naturalize assumptions about who is sanctioned to have (much less discuss and analyze) beliefs and practices. Instead of facing these discursive contradictions head-on, research in these subfields of religious studies tends to be described and conducted in one of two ways, as if the only salient choices were ones of a simple and neutral methodology. On the one hand, scholars work with an essentialist or structuralist approach that assumes a real or “strategic” ability to capture the two terms transparently. On the other hand, scholars deploy deconstructivist approaches that articulate and exploit the blurs and fissures within the operative concepts and as produced in and through their juxtaposition. This methodological divide occludes the fact that what is at stake is nothing less than the ethics and politics of interpretation and most particularly the role and place of the subject in practices of interpretation. To reverse Giroux’s words in the epigraph, essentialism and relativism imply different ethics. Essentialism deploys an ethics of (strategic) universality, privileging stability and clarity over the messy movements and transformations that always can be lifted as “exceptions,” while the ethics of deconstruction gives priority to semiotic mutations over the various inertial forces that do, materially, enact a stabilizing or reifying effect on meaning. As Giroux intimates, however, both essentialism and deconstruction fall short of the vital dynamics generally expected from the pedagogy of ethical discourse, precisely because they fail to situate these methodological tendencies squarely within “relations of power, subject positions, and social practices.” In other words, these methodologies fall short of the politics they inevitably deploy.

This book responds to this “falling short” of politics by outlining a theory of interpreting religion and film that foregrounds the social power it involves. That is, the book attends to the ethicopolitical dimensions of subject formation and social practice within the imbricating hermeneutic of religion and film. To view film at the intersection of religion and power, then, is to read and experience film as enabling reflection on the ethics of subject formation. The book’s most basic goal is to demonstrate how the viewing of film can function as an ethical “pedagogy of self.”

Ethics is a contestable word in critical theory; in using it I am drawing on Foucault’s trenchant analysis of how all discourse produces ethical effects. In his writings and lectures from the 1980s, Foucault analyzes ethics as the rapport à soi, or relation to oneself, and he sutures the contemporary discourse of ethics to the dynamics of biopower. In a useful mnemonic, Foucault quips that under monarchic sovereignty, the king’s power over a subject’s body would “let it live or make it die,” whereas under modern conditions, in which sovereignty persists only in the diffuse and headless power of capital, the power of state apparatuses over a subject’s body functions to “make it live or let it die.” Hence, instead of worrying about the guillotine or the king’s torture chambers, most of today's citizen bodies worry about things such as vaccination records, flu shots, hydrofracking under their water reservoir, and whether the waste treatment plant will be built in their neighborhood.

Under conditions of biopower, the most seemingly banal rhetoric about the self, captured in phrases such as “getting back to oneself, freeing oneself, being oneself, being authentic, etcetera” ends up ensconcing the most important political discourse of all. As Foucault writes in his 1982 lectures on The Hermeneutic of the Subject, “to constitute an ethic of the self . . . may be an urgent, fundamental, and politically indispensable task, if it's true after all that there is no first or final point of resistance to political power other than in the relationship one has to oneself.” Because U.S. society tends to privatize cultural experience and tends especially to view film as mere entertainment, it is worth underscoring Foucault's conclusion to this passage. He writes, “if we understand by governmentality a strategic field of power relations in their mobility, transformability, and reversibility, then I do not think that reflection on this notion of governmentality can avoid passing through, theoretically and practically, the element of a subject defined by the relationship of self to self.” What I grasp from Foucault is this: the “ethic of the self” is not a concept with any essential meaning and not a concept that self-deconstructs in a Derridean autoimmunity. Rather, the ethic of the self moves along bodies but outside of ontology—like electrical current passing in a field around the wires that guide it. It means nothing; it performs everything. Thus, if we acknowledge with Stanley Cavell that film watching is a kind of pedagogy, and if we acknowledge with Giroux and Foucault that pedagogy must be anchored in an ethic of the self, then we can cut through the dilemma of the “and” in “religion and film” by crafting a pedagogical hermeneutic that pulls the empty banality of “finding oneself” (as Foucault says) into a robust critique of one's “subject positions, social practices, and relations of power” (as Giroux notes). This robust critique is what I mean by the shorthand, “pedagogy of self.”

In attending to film at the intersection of religion and power, I have found that the conditions of postmodernity, or the post-postmodernity of globalization, repeatedly generate two affects: nostalgia and transcendence. I will leave the Introduction to expound on this assertion. Here let me summarize the three overarching arguments of this book, as it is situated in a series on Religion and Power:

- 1) that we cannot interpret religion and film without examining what counts as “religion” in terms of its conceptual referents and in terms of its discursive (or disciplinary) (dis)connections to film studies;

- 2) that this imbricating hermeneutic of religion and film inevitably involves ethicopolitical dimensions that generate a pedagogy of self;
- 3) and finally, that the conditions of postmodernity or postsecularity position religion nostalgically but not reactively, so that a generative politics of nostalgia becomes a necessary component of the pedagogy of self.

Acknowledgements

This book grew up with my children. It was conceived when my daughter was six months old, just after I received my doctorate from Duke University. The Chair of Duke's Religion Department, Bruce Lawrence knew that the timing of my daughter's birth had led me to miss the fall job market, and so he graciously hired me to develop and teach two courses for Duke's undergraduate program. "Religion and Film" was one of those two courses. I had no idea that stepping into that syllabus would so thoroughly reposition my intellectual questions and guideposts. My doctoral work had focused on the American Pragmatism of C. S. Peirce and the philosophical and political pursuit of how different concepts button down differently in different discourses. In general, this manner of framing my intellectual commitments has not changed, but the movement from narratives about Puritanism to filmic images of religion and transcendence has required all sorts of unforeseen reading, discussing, and self-interrogation. I wish here to thank Bruce Lawrence, again, for hiring me to develop and teach that course, and to thank all my Duke mentors who have remained stalwart supports over the years, especially Elizabeth A. Clark, Michael Hardt, and Kenneth Surin.

Once I moved to Syracuse University I found myself surrounded by another warm and supportive circle of colleagues. I wish to thank the Religion Department and the College of Arts and Sciences for granting me two sabbatical leaves, for patiently allowing me to develop and expand my teaching of religion and film, and for granting me various opportunities to present parts of this work. I wish especially to thank my tenure mentor and friends Patricia Cox Miller and David Miller for their quiet advice and firm friendship.

Syracuse has provided me an abundance of collegial support. Early on I benefited from the English Department's faculty writing group (thank you, Crystal Bartolovitch, Susan Edmund, Robert Gates, and Claudia Klaver). More recently, I have been sustained by the Le Moyne College philosophy department's faculty reading group (thank you Thomas Brockelman, Robert Flowers, William Day, and Paul Prescott), by various events at the Syracuse University Humanities Center (thank you, Gregg Lambert, Founding Director), and by the persistent challenges raised by really smart graduate students who continue to startle me by their assumption that I can teach them.

My first year at Syracuse ended with the birth of my son, so I have had two children to raise during these years, with the help of my husband Dan, whose own career has kept him out of the house more than in it. I stand convinced that mother intellectuals remain the least visible and least theorized group of knowledge-producers in the U.S. academy. It will be familiar for me to say that the labors, distractions, and obligations of teaching, committee work, and graduate student mentoring have often kept me from being the parent I have wanted to be. Indeed, it is with words such as these that the authors of many acknowledgments turn to thank their spouses or partners for picking up that necessary parental, domestic labor, thereby allowing the author to carve out time to write on top of his or her university schedule. The thing is, I am both the author and the spouse/partner. Clearly the labors, distractions, and obligations of raising my children have kept me from finishing this book in a timely fashion, but within the complex and unforgiving algorithm of what administrators term "the work-life balance," with trumpet lessons, Pilates classes, and teacher appreciation lunches on the one hand, and job searches, graduate admissions, and graduate students' dissertation drafts on the other, writing a book frequently seemed an impossible and, frankly, narcissistic task.

The dearth of time for sustained thinking and writing produces a gasping desperation in mother intellectuals. Four people have been instrumental in helping me name and process this desperation. Two were my colleagues on the American Academy of Religion's standing committee on the Status of Women in the Profession: Judith Plaskow and Anne Joh. Judith and Anne, thank you for your words of advice, empathy, and support. Your very persistence in the academy recommits me to what is at stake in this knowledge-producing work. The other two persons are colleagues at Syracuse University. I want to thank from the bottom of my heart these two friends who have seen, known, and shared my struggle to be both a thinker and a mother on a weekly, if not daily basis: Zachary Braiterman and Claudia Klaver. Zak and Claudia, without your presence and words, shared over a hastily grabbed coffee or a cell phone conversation between errands, I would not be as sane as I am (which is not very), and I might not have remained in the academy at all. Thank you both.

In recent years I have been blessed by the friendship of Timothy Isley and Randall Johnson. Tim and Randy, you have literally given me the space and food requisite for thought, and with you I have engaged in some of the most open and generous conversation, both philosophical and otherwise, that I have ever known. Thank you for sharing your home and lives with me. In addition to everything else, Tim and Randy introduced me to the artistic work of Cynthia T. Baron. Cynthia has graciously allowed me (and Palgrave) to use her compelling painting, “Nighttime in my Heart” as the cover illustration of my book.

At Palgrave, Burke Gerstenschlager and Kaylan Connally have pushed and pulled this book to publication with their intelligent, compassionate, super-competent, and incredibly efficient labors. I am grateful to them. I also wish to thank the anonymous reviewers of my manuscript, whose insightful comments and suggestions I took to heart, though perhaps not sufficiently to satisfy those reviewers.

I reserve my final and sincere thanks to Joerg Rieger for embracing this work as part of his series, for his incisive editorial comments, and for his enduring friendship.

I dedicate this book to the two body-minds who have already been most influenced by it: to my children, Elena and Seth Bingham, who continue to teach and challenge me and who constantly remind me that loving relationships are constituted through the temporal, bodily dynamics of simple things, like a hug, roasting marshmallows, or a moonlight kayak.