

Transnational Civil Society and the World Bank

Interest Groups, Advocacy and Democracy Series

Series Editor

Darren Halpin, Australian National University, Australia

The study of interest groups and their role in political life has undergone somewhat of a renaissance in recent years. Long standing scholarly themes such as interest groups influence, mobilization, formation, and 'bias', are being addressed using new and novel data sets and methods. There are also new and exciting themes, such as the role of ICTs in enabling collective action and the growth of global advocacy networks, are being added. Contemporary debates about the role of commercial lobbyists and professionalized interest representation are also highly salient. Together, they draw an ever larger and broader constituency to the study of interest groups and advocacy. This series seeks to capture both new generation studies addressing long standing themes in new ways and innovate scholarship posing new and challenging questions that emerge in a rapidly changing world.

The series encourages contributions from political science (but also abutting disciplines such as economics, law, history, international relations and sociology) that speak to these themes. It welcomes work undertaken at the sub-national, national and supra-national political systems, and particularly encourages comparative or longitudinal studies. The series is open to diverse methodologies and theoretical approaches. The book series will sit alongside and complement the new Journal of the same name.

Acknowledgements

I am deeply grateful to the many civil society leaders and World Bank staff who generously gave of their time in answering my questions and sharing their reflections on events past and present. I expect that the conclusions of this book will disappoint some of them, who may have hoped for a more sympathetic depiction of their organizations' activities. I can only stress that the purpose of this book is to assess transnational civil society's impact on the democratization of global governance, not the merits of any particular organization or activity. That civil society activism has achieved numerous positive outcomes, in human rights, environmental protection, development policy, and economic justice, is beyond question. The challenge, as this book reveals, is that the current functioning of transnational civil society gives power to a small elite. This book seeks to understand this challenge and to develop strategies by which the current, elite system can give way to a more democratic one.

In addition to the participants in the research, I wish to thank the Center for Democracy and Civil Society at Georgetown University for hosting me during my research in Washington; Jude Howell, David Lewis, Jan Aart Scholte, and Ngaire Woods for their input on the preliminary project; Jonas Tallberg for the encouragement to publish in book form; Abraham Pallas, Pamela Pallas, and Genevieve Scirica for their support in my academic endeavors; and Sarah Pallas for her input, patience, prayers, and encouragement.
