This book has been enabled as part of a project on ‘Protestant–Catholic Conflict: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Realities’, funded by the Arts and Humanities Research Council and the Economic and Social Research Council, as an Ideas and Beliefs Fellowship awarded to me under the Research Councils UK Global Uncertainties programme. In particular the grant enabled the contributors to meet together for a three-day symposium in Milton Keynes in May 2011, enabling the refinement and development of the individual chapters and the discussion of connecting themes and concepts. The aspiration is to present accessible expert assessments of the past, recent and contemporary experience of this particular form of religious tension and conflict, to inform both historical understanding and analysis of present-day legacies and comparisons.

I should like to thank the funders for making the project possible, and the contributors for their consistently enthusiastic and helpful participation in a most stimulating and enjoyable enterprise. Other participants in the symposium – Rehman Anwer, Marion Bowman, Richard Farnell, David Herbert, Neil Jarman and Stewart J. Brown – made many valuable contributions to discussion. Above all, I am grateful for Philomena Sutherland’s essential assistance in organizational as well as academic matters.

Notes on Contributors

John Bell was educated at Queen's University Belfast and is now Research Officer at the Institute for Conflict Research in Belfast, where he carried out the Northern Ireland-based research for the 'Protestant-Catholic Conflict: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Realities' project. His previous work with ICR includes Parades and Protests: An Annotated Bibliography (2007), contributions to an 18-month qualitative study of the impact of sectarianism and segregation in people's everyday lives and routines (2008) and the Community Relations Council-funded 'The Troubles aren't History yet' research project which examined young people's perceptions of Irish historical events.

Thomas Carty was educated at Holy Cross College and the University of Connecticut and is now Associate Professor of American Studies and History and Chair of the Social Sciences Department at Springfield College, Massachusetts. He is the author of A Catholic in the White House? Religion, Politics, and John F. Kennedy's Presidential Campaign (2008) and Backwards, in High Heels: Faith Whittlesey, Ronald Reagan's 'Madam Ambassador' in Switzerland and the West Wing (2012).

Mark Greengrass is Emeritus Professor of Early Modern History at the University of Sheffield, and Honorary Fellow of the Department of History, University of Warwick. In 2011, when he wrote this contribution, he was Senior External Research Fellow at FRIAS, the Institute for Advanced Studies at the University of Freiburg im Breisgau. He has recently completed vol. 5 of the Penguin History of Europe (A Disintegrating Christendom) which will appear in 2013, and is currently working on a study of communication and information in early-modern France.

Colin Haydon was educated at the University of Oxford and is currently Reader in Early Modern History at the University of Winchester. He is the author of Anti-Catholicism in Eighteenth-Century

England c. 1714–80 (1994) and John Henry Williams (1747–1829), 'Political Clergyman': War, the French Revolution, and the Church of England (2007). He edited, with John Walsh and Stephen Taylor, The Church of England c. 1689–c. 1833: From Toleration to Tractarianism (1993).

Andrew Holmes was educated at Queen's University Belfast and the University of St Andrews, and has been Lecturer in Modern Irish History at Queen's University Belfast since 2006. He is the author of The Shaping of Ulster Presbyterian Belief and Practice 1770–1840 (2006) and co-editor of Protestant Millennialism, Evangelicalism and Irish Society, 1790–2005 (2006) and Revising Burns and Ulster: Literature, Religion and Politics c 1770–1920 (2009).

Helmut Walsler Smith is Martha Rivers Ingram Professor of History at Vanderbilt University in Nashville, Tennessee. His books include German Nationalism and Religious Conflict 1870–1914 (1995), The Butcher's Tale: Murder and Anti-Semitism in a German Town (2002), The Continuities of German History: Nation, Religion and Race across the Long Nineteenth Century (2008), and, as editor, The Oxford Handbook of Modern German History.

Philomena Sutherland completed her PhD at the Open University in 2010, focusing on evangelicalism, intra-Protestant relations and anti-Catholicism in Londonderry in the second half of the nineteenth-century. Since then she has been Research Associate in Religious Studies at the Open University, working on the 'Protestant–Catholic Conflict: Historical Perspectives and Contemporary Realities' project.

Yvonne-Maria Werner is Professor of History at the University of Lund, and the author of numerous works in Swedish on Scandinavian Catholicism in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Her publications in English include two recent edited collections Christian Masculinity: Men and Religion in Northern Europe in the 19th and 20th Centuries (2011) and (with Jonas Harvard) European Anti-Catholicism in a Comparative and Transnational Perspective (2013).

John Wolffe is Professor of Religious History at the Open University and also from 2009 to 2012 Ideas and Beliefs Fellow on the Research Councils UK Global Uncertainties research programme. He is the author of numerous publications on anti-Catholicism and Protestant evangelicalism, including The Protestant Crusade in Great Britain, 1829–1860 (1991) and (with Mark Hutchinson) A Short History of Global Evangelicalism (2012).
