I also remind myself that it would probably not be worth the trouble of making books if they failed to teach the author something he hadn't known before, if they didn't lead to unforeseen places and if they didn't disperse one toward a strange and new relation with himself. The pain and the pleasure of the book is to be an experience.

(Foucault, 1986: preface)

The pain and pleasure of the experience has been possible because of the countless people who shared their views, expertise and the journey. Writing a first book is not dissimilar to a PhD voyage which is accompanied by many seafaring fellows along the way, some who come and go, while others remain. If I really thought about it, I would probably find there are over 100 people who have listened to me talk about my book ideas, difficulties and triumphs. These range from students in a classroom to colleagues in my department and family alongside loyal friends. There are probably nearer to 500 people who have contributed to the final book: the authors and researchers whose hard graft and genius I built on; the young people who kindly shared their personal and private stories to make the research and book possible; and colleagues who shared their professional experience, some generously offering support and advice. As there are too many to acknowledge, I will instead thank particular key contributors.

The Youth Service and Sex and Relationship Education (SRE) educators for opening their doors to scrutiny, and the young people for entrusting me to represent their views and lives. Thank you for giving me your time, trust, honesty, generosity and humour. In particular, thanks go to Lynnette for her advice and continued, limitless, commitment to young people's issues. She is an inspiration to her profession and aspiration for practitioners and service providers.

Sarah for her expertise, kindness and patience throughout, including academic excellence and professional integrity. James for his support with earlier drafts and less than truthful assessment in an attempt to bolster my confidence. Ray for help with the initial book proposal and ironic predicted deadline of seven years to completion! Alongside, Teela, Shona and Phil. I am grateful to Mark for his encouragement and support in the final difficult stages of writing as well as both Nicks, Ruth, Wendy, Zowie and Flo. Thanks also to my publishers, especially Andrew, for their patience and perseverance.

Finally, thanks go to my friends, Jo, Pat, Ella, Nelson and York. Not forgetting Mum, for her tireless support, countless hours of proofreading, reverse psychology and temporary adoption of pets. Not only do you have a PhD graduation photograph on the wall, you now have a book on the shelf to dust! Without all these people there would be no chapter or journey, nor ending or new beginning. The pain and pleasure of the experience is the book.
