Acknowledgements

This book could not have been written without the encouragement, cooperation and support of a range of people. I wish to thank first the editors of the Palgrave Studies in European Union Politics for encouraging me to write the book. I am particularly grateful to Neill Nugent for his valuable comments on the original manuscript draft. I am also extremely grateful to the editors and to staff at Palgrave for their patience as I finalized the manuscript.

Second, I extend my sincere thanks to the numerous officials from the EU's institutions, the MEPs, the officials from member state governments and the journalists who either played a part in or observed the preparation, negotiation and drafting of the Treaty of Lisbon in 2007 and who all gave generously of their time to be interviewed. I wish to acknowledge too the financial support of the British Academy (SG090313 – Negotiating the Treaty of Lisbon) in facilitating various research trips to Brussels and assorted national capitals.

Third, I wish to thank participants at seminar and conference presentations at Queen's University Belfast, University College Dublin, the University of Exeter and UACES Annual Research Conferences for the constructive feedback they provided on elements of the analysis presented here.

Finally, I am indebted to Antonia and Lara for their constant support and understanding as I indulged my pre-occupation with yet another round of EU treaty reform. This book is dedicated to them.
