ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

The University of Birmingham granted me a period of research leave for writing, as well as funding to allow me to see a lot of theatre, to spend time in rehearsal, to meet directors and to travel.

My colleagues at the Department of Drama and Theatre Arts, and our School and College have been supportive and collegiate as ever. Particular thanks to Dr. Paul Geary, who read and offered feedback on draft material for two chapters; to Dr. Ruth Gilligan for her keen eye; to Jess Parfitt for her understanding; and to Dr. Rose Whyman, who suggested our trip to Moscow. Thanks, too, for the constructive and detailed comments on the draft manuscript from the publisher's peer reviewer.

I have also been able to share draft material at conferences, particularly the Theatre and Performance Research Association (UK) and the British Theatre in the Twenty-first Century conference (Paris), and at the University of Surrey. Thanks to Professor Peter Boenisch, who invited me to share research at the University of Kent. A short section of material on Katie Mitchell and Simon Stephens in Chapter 2 previously appeared in a special edition of the journal Contemporary Theatre Review and is reproduced here with permission. I am grateful for the author's permission to use the epigraph above, which comes from G. Gabrielle Starr's Feeling Beauty, a book I use throughout.

Special thanks to those directors who have generously allowed me 'in the room', especially Katie Mitchell, or had conversations with me. Carrie Cracknell provided the cover image and offered to revise some of the script materials from her production of The Deep Blue Sea (National Theatre), which appears as an example in Chapter 4. Thanks to those directors and organisations who have read and offered suggestions and clarifications to the parts in which their work appears.

Palgrave Macmillan have been patient whilst this book came to fruition: particular thanks to Vicky Bates for answering my many questions, to Tomas René, to Paula Kennedy and the production team. Thanks to Tanya Izzard for creating the very thorough index. Thanks too to the several photographers and theatre organisations who supplied images of directors in action.

My family have been patient and supportive, particularly as the work of writing a book on theatre seems to involve a great deal of time away on trains.
