Aims of the Series

The Palgrave Critical Criminological Perspectives book series aims to showcase the importance of critical criminological thinking when examining problems of crime, social harm and criminal and social justice. Critical perspectives have been instrumental in creating new research agendas and areas of criminological interest. By challenging state defined concepts of crime and rejecting positive analyses of criminality, critical criminological approaches continually push the boundaries and scope of criminology, creating new areas of focus and developing new ways of thinking about, and responding to, issues of social concern at local, national and global levels. Recent years have witnessed a flourishing of critical criminological narratives and this series seeks to capture the original and innovative ways that these discourses are engaging with contemporary issues of crime and justice.

Acknowledgements

Like all intellectual endeavours, this book is the result of numerous conversations and influences, and I owe a great debt of thanks to the many colleagues with whom I have discussed these issues over recent years.

To begin, I want to acknowledge the Turrbal and Jagera peoples, who are the traditional owners of the land on which I work, walk, and live.

I want to thank Samantha Jeffries, who set me on this particular research path. Our initial discussions about the need for research and policy relating to intimate partner violence in LGBT (lesbian, gay, bisexual, transgender) relationships, and our subsequent publication in this area, initially sparked my interest in sexuality, gender, and criminology.

My initial exploration of this area was aided substantially by a period of sabbatical leave during which I was a Visiting Scholar in the Centre for Sex, Gender, and Sexualities at Durham University, UK. I am grateful to Jo Phoenix, who was instrumental in making this happen and in giving me the space at Durham to explore my ideas, and who also constantly challenged the directions of my research. During my time in the UK, I was also lucky to benefit from the generosity of, and many discussions with, Maggie O'Neill, Mark McCormack, Liz Morrish, and Pat Carlen.

As always, all of my colleagues in the School of Justice at Queensland University of Technology over the years have been incredibly supportive and absolutely key to the development of the ideas presented here.

In particular, I would like to thank Kerry Carrington for giving me the space not only to write this book, but also the encouragement to pursue this research path. Sharon Hayes, Molly Dragiewicz, Jodi Death, John Scott, Debra Robertson-Stainsby, Juan Tauri, and Cassandra Cross have also offered similar encouragement or provided their own feedback on these ideas. I would especially like to thank Erin O'Brien for being a great motivator, writing colleague, and friend, whose good humour and friendship I am truly thankful for.

Belinda Carpenter deserves special thanks for generously taking the time in her busy schedule to read and comment in detail on the book, and on these ideas more generally. I am very lucky to have had the opportunity to learn so much about academia from her as a mentor, and I deeply appreciate it.

I cannot thank Angela Dwyer enough for being a great friend, mentor, co-supervisor, co-editor, and partner in crime (research). Her engagement with similar research issues in queer criminology always helped me feel less isolated on this journey than I might otherwise have been and her generosity has always been appreciated.

Special thanks are also due to Jey Rodgers, who very ably compiled much of the literature on which this book is based, who has always been a great resource for anything and everything queer, and with whom I discussed a number of the ideas explored here in their early form. The book would not have been possible without this assistance, and I am sincerely thankful for it.

And I would like to acknowledge and thank the growing number of queer criminologists whose work I have been inspired by, engaged with, critiqued, or built on. It is indeed exciting to be working through these issues and forging new criminological territory with you all. In particular, I would like to thank Vanessa R. Panfil, Carrie L. Buist, Jordan Blair Woods, Aimee Wodda, Emily Lenning, Nicole Asquith, Derek Dalton, Stephen Tomsen, and Dave McDonald.

There are also many people who provided me with the personal support necessary to complete this book, and whom I would like to thank. First, I want to acknowledge Reece Walters and Deborah Drake for believing in the book and seeing it as worthy of inclusion in their series. I also want to thank the editorial and production teams at Palgrave Macmillan, specifically Julia Willan, Harriet Barker, and Dominic Walker, who have all been incredibly supportive of the book, and who have continually tolerated requests to extend the delivery date for the manuscript. I do hope these extensions have paid off.

My family continue to be a most incredible source of love, encouragement, and happiness in my life. My parents Graham and Cheryl, and my sister Christine, continue to support me in whatever I do, even though at times I am not entirely sure they know exactly what it is that I do. The rest of my family—too numerous to mention individually—are also incredibly supportive, and I know for sure that they have even less idea about what I do. I also want to thank my oldest and closest friend, Dave Merrick, who has always been family to me, and who makes it easy for me to take a break from myself.

Finally, I want to thank my partner, Christian. There is simply no way to describe my gratitude to him for everything that he has done. Everything that is beautiful and wonderful in my life is because of him. When we met eight years ago, neither of us could have imagined the journey that lay ahead of us. Every minute of it—even when we have both been hard at work at whatever personal projects consume us at that moment—has been a joy, and he has been unwavering in his love and support for me. It is to him that this book is dedicated.
