

Religion and Post-Conflict Statebuilding

Palgrave Studies in Compromise after Conflict

Series editor:

Professor John D. Brewer

Institute for the Study of Conflict, Queen's University Belfast, UK

Series advisory board:

John Braithwaite, Australian National University, Hastings Donnan, Queen's University Belfast, UK, Brandon Hamber, University of Ulster, UK, Ian McAlister, Australian National University, William Mishler, University of Arizona, UK, Barbara Misztal, University of Leicester, UK, Orla Muldoon, University of Limerick, Ireland, Clifford Shearing, University of Cape Town, South Africa.

Titles include:

John D. Brewer, David Mitchell, Gerard Leavey
EX-COMBATANTS, RELIGION AND PEACE IN NORTHERN IRELAND
The Role of Religion in Transitional Justice

Denis Dragovic
RELIGION AND POST-CONFLICT STATEBUILDING
Roman Catholic and Sunni Islamic Perspectives

Sandra Milena Rios Oyola
RELIGION, SOCIAL MEMORY AND CONFLICT
The Massacre of Bojayá in Colombia

Palgrave Studies in Compromise after Conflict
Series Standing Order ISBN 978-1-137-29935-2 hardback
(outside North America only)

You can receive future titles in this series as they are published by placing a standing order. Please contact your bookseller or, in case of difficulty, write to us at the address below with your name and address, the title of the series and the ISBN quoted above.

Customer Services Department, Macmillan Distribution Ltd, Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire RG21 6XS, England

Religion and Post-Conflict Statebuilding

Roman Catholic and Sunni Islamic Perspectives

Denis Dragovic

University of Melbourne, Australia

palgrave
macmillan

© Denis Dragovic 2015
Softcover reprint of the hardcover 1st edition 2015 978-1-137-45514-7

All rights reserved. No reproduction, copy or transmission of this publication may be made without written permission.

No portion of this publication may be reproduced, copied or transmitted save with written permission or in accordance with the provisions of the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988, or under the terms of any licence permitting limited copying issued by the Copyright Licensing Agency, Saffron House, 6–10 Kirby Street, London EC1N 8TS.

Any person who does any unauthorized act in relation to this publication may be liable to criminal prosecution and civil claims for damages.

The author has asserted his right to be identified as the author of this work in accordance with the Copyright, Designs and Patents Act 1988.

First published 2015 by
PALGRAVE MACMILLAN

Palgrave Macmillan in the UK is an imprint of Macmillan Publishers Limited, registered in England, company number 785998, of Houndmills, Basingstoke, Hampshire RG21 6XS.

Palgrave Macmillan in the US is a division of St Martin's Press LLC, 175 Fifth Avenue, New York, NY 10010.

Palgrave Macmillan is the global academic imprint of the above companies and has companies and representatives throughout the world.

Palgrave® and Macmillan® are registered trademarks in the United States, the United Kingdom, Europe and other countries.

ISBN 978-1-349-49807-9 ISBN 978-1-137-45515-4 (eBook)
DOI 10.1057/9781137455154

This book is printed on paper suitable for recycling and made from fully managed and sustained forest sources. Logging, pulping and manufacturing processes are expected to conform to the environmental regulations of the country of origin.

A catalogue record for this book is available from the British Library.

A catalog record for this book is available from the Library of Congress.

*To my wife, Dijana,
thank you for your eternal patience*

This page intentionally left blank

Contents

List of Figures and Tables	ix
Series Editor's Preface	x
Preface and Acknowledgements	xiv
Note on Transliteration	xvii
Introduction	1
1 Religion and Post-Conflict Statebuilding	9
How states fail	10
Religion and post-conflict statebuilding	12
Religion and legitimization	16
Religion, legitimacy and legal validity	19
Religion, legitimacy and justification of rules	21
Religion, legitimacy and expressions of consent	25
Religion and institutional effectiveness	29
Security	30
Basic services	43
Conclusion	47
2 Roman Catholic View of the State	51
Roman Catholicism	54
The Church's changing view of the state	55
3 Salvation as the Catholic Post-Conflict Statebuilding Imperative	60
The Catholic Church and state legitimacy	62
Legal validity	63
Justification of rules	63
Expressions of consent	65
The Catholic Church and public security	67
The Catholic Church and basic services	69
Conclusion on Roman Catholicism	74
4 Sunni Islam and the State	77
Schools of Sunni Islam thought	79
Jurisprudence	80
Theology	81

5 Justice as the Sunni Post-Conflict Statebuilding Imperative	84
Sunni Islam and state legitimacy	90
Legal validity	91
Justification of rules	95
Expressions of consent	97
Sunni Islam and public security	99
Sunni Islam and basic needs	103
Conclusion on Sunni Islam	105
6 Bosnia and Herzegovina	109
Religion and state legitimacy	112
Religion and public security	121
Religion and social capital	123
Religion and civic values	127
Religion and basic needs	129
Theology and statebuilding	131
Sunni Islam	132
Catholicism	135
Conclusion	138
Conclusion	143
Notes	153
Bibliography	178
Index	190

Figures and Tables

Figures

1.1	Religious institutions and post-conflict statebuilding	48
6.1	Percentage trust ('a lot') in various institutions of BiH	111

Tables

1.1	Religious institutions and legitimization	29
1.2	Types of beneficial social capital	34
5.1	Requirement to migrate	89
6.1	Religion's standing in the Bosnia and Herzegovinian community	111
6.2	Summary of religious contribution to legitimizing the state	122
6.3	Religious magazines' monthly circulation figures	128
6.4	Summary of religious contribution to public security	130
6.5	Summary of religious contribution to basic needs	132
6.6	Theological impetus	138

Series Editor's Preface

'Compromise' is a much used but little understood term. There is a sense in which it describes a set of feelings (the so-called 'spirit' of compromise) that involves reciprocity, representing the agreement to make mutual concessions toward each other from now on: no matter what we did to each other in the past, we will act toward each other in the future differently as set out in the agreement between us. The compromise settlement can be a spit and a handshake, much beloved in folklore, or a legally binding statute with hundreds of clauses.

As such, it is clear that compromise enters into conflict transformation at two distinct phases. The first is during the conflict resolution process itself, where compromise represents a willingness amongst parties to negotiate a peace agreement that represents a second-best preference in which they give up their first preference (victory) in order to cut a deal. A great deal of literature has been produced in Peace Studies and International Relations on the dynamics of the negotiation process and the institutional and governance structures necessary to consolidate the agreement afterwards. Just as important, however, is compromise in the second phase, when compromise is part of post-conflict reconstruction, in which protagonists come to learn to live together despite their former enmity and in face of the atrocities perpetrated during the conflict itself.

In the first phase, compromise describes reciprocal agreements between parties to the negotiations in order to make political concessions sufficient to end conflict; in the second phase, compromise involves victims and perpetrators developing ways of living together in which concessions are made as part of shared social life. The first is about compromises between political groups and the state in the process of statebuilding (or re-building) after the political upheavals of communal conflict, and the second is about compromises between individuals and communities in the process of social healing after the cultural trauma provoked by the conflict.

This book series primarily concerns itself with the second process, the often messy and difficult job of reconciliation, restoration and repair in social and cultural relations following communal conflict. Communal conflicts and civil wars tend to suffer from the narcissism of minor differences, to use Freud's phrase, leaving little to be split halfway and compromise on, and thus are usually especially bitter. The series therefore addresses itself to the meaning, manufacture and management of compromise in one of its most difficult settings. The book series is cross-national and cross-disciplinary, with attention paid to interpersonal reconciliation at the level of everyday life, as well as culturally between social groups, and the many sorts of institutional, interpersonal, psychological, sociological, anthropological and cultural factors that assist and inhibit societal healing in all post-conflict societies, historically and in the present. It focuses on what compromise means when people have to come to terms with past enmity and the memories of the conflict itself, and relate to former protagonists in ways that consolidate the wider political agreement.

This sort of focus has special resonance and significance for peace agreements, which are usually very fragile. Societies emerging out of conflict are subject to ongoing violence from spoiler groups who are reluctant to give up on first preferences, constant threats from the outbreak of renewed violence, institutional instability, weakened economies, and a wealth of problems around transitional justice, memory, truth recovery and victimhood, amongst others. Not surprisingly therefore, reconciliation and healing in social and cultural relations is difficult to achieve, not least because interpersonal compromise between erstwhile enemies is difficult.

Lay discourse picks up on the ambivalent nature of compromise after conflict. It is talked about in a common sense in one of two ways, in which compromise is either a virtue or a vice, taking its place among the angels or in Hades. One form of lay discourse likens concessions to former protagonists with the idea of restoration of broken relationships and societal and cultural reconciliation, in which there is a sense of becoming (or returning) to wholeness and completeness. The other form of lay discourse invokes ideas of appeasement, of being compromised by the concessions, which constitute a form of surrender and reproduce (or disguise) continued brokenness and division. People feel they continue to be beaten by the sticks that the concessions have allowed others to keep; with restoration, however, weapons are truly turned into ploughshares. Lay discourse suggests, therefore, that there are issues that the Palgrave Studies in Compromise after Conflict series must begin to problematize, so that the process of societal healing is better understood and can be assisted and facilitated by public policy and intervention.

This second book in the Palgrave Studies in Compromise after Conflict series explores the contribution of religion to compromise and peace-building, and in particular its role in re-building the post-conflict state. Religious peace-building is largely an academic interest nurtured in the post-Cold War period. This might appear paradoxical, for this period witnessed the tragic intensification of religiously motivated violence; and with it the significant growth of academic interest and research on the connection between religion and conflict. The balance was bound to shift, however, as academics, researchers and practitioners focused on the reverse side of the same Janus face: religion as a site of reconciliation and compromise rather than of conflict. Religious peace-building is now a burgeoning field.

The popularity of this new field is partly to be explained by the relevance of inter-faith dialogue between the Abrahamic religions of Christianity, Judaism and Islam to the growth of Islamic extremism and as the conflict in the Middle East rumbles on to negatively affect global security and international affairs. Another influence is the increasing direction of transitional justice studies towards religious studies, theology, morals and ethics in its concern with topics like truth recovery, social justice, atonement strategies, memory and reparation. The interest of theologians, for example, in the meaning of political forgiveness is matched by the significant involvement on the ground of religious actors and faith-based organizations in a variety of truth recovery mechanisms across the world.

A third reason for the growth of religious peace-building as an intellectual concern is cultural. The religious peace-building literature is overwhelmingly dominated by US-based scholars, and the USA as a cultural space promotes the practice of religious peace-building as a form of conflict resolution and an intellectual interest in mapping the field. Unlike Europe, the USA has never experienced religious violence and has no cultural or folk memory of holy war. It can therefore be more readily seen as part of the solution rather than as part of the problem. The USA also separates church and state, thus having no one religion dominating politics or the public square; and there is a high level of religious observance, as against the European trend. This encourages people in the USA to take religion seriously and facilitates them to see it as having a positive role in society and politics. Therefore, it is not only US political, international and strategic interests after the end of the Cold War that explains the growth of this new field; as a cultural space the USA is more inclined to see religion as capable of playing a positive role in conflict resolution and peace-building.

It is usual to consider religious peace builders as having interests and expertise in the second process of compromise that I have identified here, in relation to individuals, groups and communities who are rebuilding society and learning to live together after conflict. The difficult task of re-building communal bonds and restoring relationships often lends itself to religious precepts, values and practices around forgiveness, atonement, justice, reconciliation and healing. Dealing with the legacy issues arising from past violence, especially for victims, can be thought of as particularly suited to the pastoral skills of faith-based actors. Nation re-building at the grass roots level after conflict also seems relevant to the largely local focus of religious actors and faith-based organizations. The bottom-up nature of the nation-building project is consistent with the communal ties and grass root spaces in which religious peace builders usually operate. For all these reasons, religion seems to have quite specific roles in the promotion and development of post-conflict compromise.

What is special about this particular book in the series is its attention to the role of religion in the first process of compromise, that between political groups and parties in a process of statebuilding. Statebuilding at the institutional level and nation building at the community level are two different aspects of peace-building. This book is unique because it explores the role of religious precepts, values and practices in creating legitimacy for the post-conflict state and in introducing effective institutional reform of the state. The focus on religious contributions to statebuilding at the top rather than to nation building at the bottom makes this a new and exciting contribution to the religious peace-building literature. What is especially noteworthy is its interface between theory and practice. The author combines close hermeneutical analysis of the religious precepts, values and practices in Roman Catholicism and Sunni Islam as they relate to statebuilding after conflict, with a thorough and detailed analysis of their use in the empirical case of Bosnia and Herzegovina, as one concrete example. He both illuminates an empirical instance of post-conflict statebuilding and contributes to our theorization of religious peace-building. As Editor I warmly welcome this new addition to the Palgrave Studies in Compromise after Conflict series.

John D. Brewer

Preface and Acknowledgements

My interest in religion and its possible role in post-conflict statebuilding began while in Najaf, Iraq. As the head of a field office for an international NGO I was in the Shia holy city on 29 August 2003 when a car bomb exploded two miles away at the shrine of Imam Ali. It turned out to be one of the deadliest then and since, killing 125 people including Ayatollah Mohammed Baqir al-Hakim, a leading cleric. As my security and that of our staff and projects were tied to our relations with the community and their religious leaders I began to visit those senior clerics who had chosen to remain.

The first cleric I met was Ayatollah Muhammad Said al-Hakim, who was very kind in his praise of our work and spoke highly of us to others. Another cleric, Ayatollah Sheikh Bashir, was animated during our meeting, as he believed me to be a CIA agent sent to plan his assassination. After two hours of discussions, including explaining how the international aid system works and why I thought myself a neutral actor despite receiving funds from the US government, we parted ways with him calling me a brother. The hostile welcome became a promise to lend his support to our efforts. True to his word, he spoke of the sanctity of our work during Friday prayers as did al-Hakim.

At one point I had a scheduling clash—a delayed meeting with a young, relatively junior cleric overlapped with the arrival of the newly appointed Coalition Provisional Authority representative to Najaf, Ambassador Robert Ford. Looking back I chose poorly, leaving Moqtadr al-Sadr's office after waiting for nearly an hour, at which point I headed out to meet with Ambassador Ford. The agenda, determined by the professional statebuilding set present at the meeting, focused on the progress in the physical and institutional rebuilding of the state apparatus in Najaf. I took the opportunity to ask whether the newly appointed representative to Najaf would be meeting with the Ayatollahs of the city. The reply was an emphatic 'No'. His instructions were clear. His role was to support the central state apparatus by strengthening its influence in the governorate. Living in and amongst the community, to me the view seemed to be naïve, disconnected from Iraqi society and its authority structures, an opportunity lost.

After nearly three years of living in the 'red zone' of Iraq, a year in Sudan, a return to Iraq and some work with the United Nations in the West Bank, among other postings, it became apparent to me that not engaging with religious leaders in Iraq was not a contextual, calculated move but rather an inexplicable, systematic omission. Perceived as axiomatic this view was not unique to a particular mindset—the neocon preaching the virtues of secular democracy or the less travelled bureaucrat—but ranged across the board, including being embraced by diplomatic officers, international policy advisors, United Nations staff and even some NGO aid workers.

The responsibility for the persistence of this view cannot solely be placed at the feet of practitioners. Little thought had been put into how engagement with religious representatives should be undertaken, what benefits could be gained and, critically, whether religious leaders would even agree to contribute their substantial resources and legitimacy to the statebuilding effort. In other words, academics too had either overlooked or dismissed this relationship. A few implied a role and implicitly acknowledged religion's presence, but invariably stopped short of naming and engaging with it.

Once I decided to engage on a scholarly basis with this topic another challenge arose—finding an appropriate place to undertake the research. When it comes to religion most universities have transitioned from teaching theology or divinity to embracing the idea of religious studies. The former embraces and builds from fundamental foundations such as the gift of grace, the afterlife and the power of Jesus' sacrifice to redeem man in the eyes of God (and similar concepts in other religions). The latter treats such beliefs as myths whose practices need to be explained within cultural, historical or political constructs within this temporal world. In this view, whether God is real or not does not matter. But from my experiences in deeply religious (Islamic) societies such as Najaf and Khartoum I realized that to understand the politics of religion, reason must come second to revelation, no matter how irrational or illogical this may seem within our modern world. This is because the scriptures offer knowledge that no human ideas can displace, not only on how to live one's life but also in some cases on how states and societies should be structured. The only academic discipline that adequately engages with religion in such a way is theology.

Problematically, though, not only are theology departments in Western universities near extinct, but those that remain have chosen to isolate themselves within their own spiritual sphere as if the challenges faced by the world are only those of the world (a situation that has made it all the more difficult for Western scholarship to understand Islamic fundamentalism). Nevertheless a few remain. It was in Scotland that I found an appropriate home for this research and am grateful for the resources available at the University of St Andrews that made this possible. In addition, many thanks are due to my advisor, a Chilean former Catholic priest, anthropologist of East African tribes and scholar of Christian–Buddhist dialogue, Professor Mario Aguilar.

I hope that this research contributes in some small way to the recent re-engagement with religion by policy makers, practitioners and academia.

Note on Transliteration

The transliteration system used in this book is that of the International Journal of Middle East Studies published by Cambridge University Press.

Regarding the use of the terms 'God' and 'Allah', I have chosen to refer to the Abrahamic god using the term 'God', whereas when speaking within the context of Islam I refer to the same God using the Arabic term 'Allah'.

For quotations in English of the Qur'an I use Yusuf Ali's work and for the Bible the New International Version.