Acknowledgments

Acknowledgments hardly seem sufficient for the gratitude I owe to the many people whose influences shaped this project. This book began as a dissertation at the Ohio State University, where I had the great fortune to work with an exemplary collection of mentors. I am especially beholden to the insightful guidance of Lisa Kiser, whose endless generosity and flawless advice lent me the energy and confidence to complete this book. To the magisterial yet convivial Frank Coulson, I am forever indebted to his invitations to cross the street from the English department. Without him, this project would not exist. I am also thankful for the perspicacity and engagement of Ethan Knapp, an insightful reader with profound questions. My colleagues at Eastern New Mexico University have been especially supportive of my work, especially Ed Avila, who read and helped me revise my first chapter. I also realize the great debt I owe to the encouragement and patience of my students, whose boundless curiosity and excitement are my true inspiration.

In addition, extended conversations with various scholars in the field prompted me to rethink continually: for their wisdom and friendship, I sincerely thank Christopher A. Jones, Leslie Lockett, Craig Kallendorf, Robert F. Yeager, and Michael Van Dussen. I also received crucial inspiration for my work on Boccaccio and Ovid from Brenda Deen Schildgen, Peter Hawkins, Akash Kumar, Jessica Blum and the other participants in “Dante’s Divine Comedy: Poetry, Philosophy, and the City of Florence” with the National Endowment for the Humanities in 2014. Furthermore, I owe my sincerest gratitude to Frank Coulson, Gregory Hays, and David Gura who lent me their unpublished notes about Ovidian commentaries, showing remarkable generosity and patience with a vernacular scholar such as I am.

I am grateful to Bonnie Wheeler, the series editor, Brigitte Shull, and Ryan Jenkins at Palgrave Macmillan for their encouragement, insight, and immediate interest in this project. I also want to thank Wendy Watkins and the Ohio State University's Center for Epigraphical and Palaeographical Studies for aid in using their collections. A chapter of this book has also been taken from "‘As olde bookes maken us memorie’: Chaucer and the Clerical Commentary Tradition," previously published in Florilegium in 2012. Therefore, to A. E. Christa Canitz, I am indebted not only for the rights to republish an article from her journal, but also for the invaluable notes that she and her anonymous editors provided.

Perhaps most importantly, I am indebted to Linda Georgianna and Victoria Silver who first drew me to this path. Thank you for opening my world, showing me the beauty of research and teaching, and inspiring me to live up to the impeccable standards you set for yourselves. Thank you for changing my life and remaining such steady presences throughout my many phases.

Finally, I am fortunate for the love and support of my family. I extend my heartfelt gratitude to my parents, Allyson, Pam, Danny, Ben, Lyam, and my grandparents, who patiently listened to my endless fixation with Ovid and the Middle Ages and taught me the value of pursuing my passion. You bring joy and richness to my life, ensuring that I remember the world outside of my books.
