ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Much of the research for this book was conducted in the Department of International Politics at Aberystwyth University. Thanks are due to the Department and to the Economic and Social Research Council for their support, as well as to colleagues at Aber for providing a stimulating atmosphere in which to develop the project. I owe a particular debt to Hidemi Suganami and Howard Williams, whose insight and guidance were essential to the development of the argument presented here. Thanks are also due to Milja Kurki and Nick Rengger for helpful comments and advice concerning the ways in which the project might be developed.

I have also benefitted from many productive conversations with Daniel R. McCarthy, with whom I look forward to further pursuing issues identified in this research. The book was completed in the Department of Politics and International Relations and Centre for the Study of Democracy at the University of Westminster – my thanks to Westminster colleagues for providing a collegial environment in which to finish the project.

Special thanks are due to my wife, Ann-Marie Olden, without whose unstinting love, patience, and support this book could never have been completed. I must also express my deep gratitude to my father, Mike Fluck, for a lifetime of invaluable support and encouragement.

This book is dedicated to the memory of my mother, Ann Fluck.
