“The vibrant world of contemporary Irish crime fiction finally has the critical book it needs and deserves: Brian Cliff’s thoughtful study tracks developments between and across genres, times and places and offers a nuanced account of the culture and history of Irish crime writing.”

—Claire Connolly, Professor of Modern English, University College Cork, Ireland

Since its invention in the nineteenth century, detective fiction has never been more popular. In novels, short stories and films, on the radio, on television and now in computer games, private detectives and psychopaths, poisoners and overworked cops, tommy gun gangsters and cocaine criminals are the very stuff of modern imagination, and their creators a mainstay of popular consciousness. Crime Files is a ground-breaking series offering scholars, students and discerning readers a comprehensive set of guides to the world of crime and detective fiction. Every aspect of crime writing, from detective fiction to the gangster movie, true-crime exposé, police procedural and post-colonial investigation, is explored through clear and informative texts offering comprehensive coverage and theoretical sophistication.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I am grateful to Trinity College Dublin for their research support, and for the career break that allowed me to finish this book. I am particularly indebted to the following for their support of the festival that led me to begin this book: Darryl Jones, my Head of School at the time and our current Dean; Jane Ohlmeyer in her role as the head of Trinity's globalisation efforts, through which the festival had the invaluable help of Julia Maher, whose energy and creativity elevated the event; and our student assistants for the festival, including Richard Howard, Caitlín Nic Íomhair, and Michaela Marková. That festival would not have happened without my co-organiser Professor John Waters and his colleagues at New York University's Glucksman Ireland House, which (with the support of their Dean, Professor Tom Carew) is an invaluable centre of Irish research and among the most hospitable of hosts for Irish crime fiction. The energy and profane good cheer of Joe Long and Seth Kavanagh also did much to make the weekend what it was. Above all, that event was lucky to have the contributions of nineteen novelists who gave their time, energy, and engagement. Additionally, the festival – like everyone working on or in Irish crime fiction – owes a particular debt to Declan Burke for his years of work drawing attention to the genre with his own fiction, with the books he has edited, and with his long-running blog Crime Always Pays.

Portions of this book were previously published in earlier forms as 'A "honeycomb world": John Connolly's Charlie Parker Series,' in The Contemporary Irish Detective Novel, edited by Elizabeth Mannion (Palgrave, 2016); and 'Genre and Uncertainty in Tana French's Dublin

Murder Squad Mysteries,' in Twenty-First Century Popular Fiction, edited by Bernice Murphy and Stephen Matterson (Edinburgh University Press, 2018). I am grateful for the permission to include this work here.

Much of the thought behind this book was refined through an advanced seminar I taught with my colleague Christopher Morash in the spring of 2015, with the support of our Head of School, Eve Patten. I am grateful to Chris for the collaboration, and to our students in that seminar for making the semester so rewarding. I have consistently benefited from the friendship, intellectual challenge, and professional support of numerous colleagues at Trinity, including Micheál Ó Siochrú, Mark Hennessy, and Caoimhe ní Bhraonáin in Irish Studies, and my School of English colleagues Terence Brown, Clare Clarke, Philip Coleman, Paul Delaney, Aileen Douglas, Nicholas Grene, Darryl Jones, Jarlath Killeen, Deirdre Madden, Stephen Matterson, Bernice Murphy, Brendan O'Connell, David O'Shaughnessy, Eve Patten, Ian Campbell Ross, Sam Slote, Tom Walker, and Pádraic Whyte. I'm similarly indebted to colleagues elsewhere, including Lee Behlman, Patrick Bixby, Alan Cattier, Hugh Cohen, Brendan Corcoran, Eric Falci, Renee Fox, Jon Greenberg, Geraldine Higgins, Ronan Kelly, Joseph Lennon, Patricia Matthew, Barry McCrea, Carole Meyers, Lois Overbeck, Adrian Patterson, Jessica Restaino, Ronald Schuchard, Éibhear Walshe, John Waters, and particularly Emilie Pine and Elizabeth Mannion, whose readings of early chapters were incisive and invariably right. Ellen Clair Lamb was of unfailingly good cheer as she dispensed good advice and helpful suggestions. I've also been fortunate in the editors that I've worked with at Palgrave, especially Vicky Bates, Ben Doyle, and Tom René, all of whom were warmly helpful and exceedingly patient at every turn.

I'm grateful for the support of my parents, Tom and Joan Cliff, with their Midwestern levels of positivity, and for that of my in-laws Lew and LaVonda Rothman. I was lucky to have Patrick and Betsy Cliff's encouragement, and their ability to edit with the wisdom of journalists; all excess verbiage (like the word 'verbiage') is entirely my fault. Kevin Walter, Diana Lyon, Vincent Keenan, and Jamie Kaye Walters have long been supportive and encouraging in all things. Sam Rothman, John Hankin, Shane Rothman, Whitney Ballard, Luke Rothman, and Jared Fronk: thanks, always, for being such a welcoming family. Charlie, Gus, Logan, and Ezra did me the invaluable favour of letting me know someone out there thinks I'm reliably funny. Chuey contributed just by raising everyone's spirits, as has Elven.

Above all, I am thankful beyond words for my wife Marni Rothman and my daughter Maura Cliff, for their patience, their love, their faith in my ability to see this through, and, well, just because. My world would be a greyer one without you.
