

Rethinking Peace and Conflict Studies

Series Editor
Oliver P. Richmond
University of Manchester
Manchester, UK

This agenda-setting series of research monographs, now more than a decade old, provides an interdisciplinary forum aimed at advancing innovative new agendas for approaches to, and understandings of, peace and conflict studies and International Relations. Many of the critical volumes the series has so far hosted have contributed to new avenues of analysis directly or indirectly related to the search for positive, emancipatory, and hybrid forms of peace. New perspectives on peacemaking in practice and in theory, their implications for the international peace architecture, and different conflict-affected regions around the world, remain crucial. This series' contributions offers both theoretical and empirical insights into many of the world's most intractable conflicts and any subsequent attempts to build a new and more sustainable peace, responsive to the needs and norms of those who are its subjects.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book is dedicated to the women in Bosnia and Herzegovina who contributed in many different ways to the process of completing this study, taking the time and trouble to meet me during successive research trips and allowing me to make this project possible. My deepest thanks go to all those who kindly accepted to share their personal stories, their energy, expertise, knowledge and passion. Our conversations were truly invaluable not only for this study but also as a learning personal experience. I hope I have managed to retell your stories with sensitivity and respect. Any mistakes I have made are my own.

I have been reflecting on the themes of this book for a decade and I am grateful to many people who inspired and shaped the project throughout the years. The book began as a Ph.D. project at Queen's University Belfast where I was lucky to be surrounded by wonderful mentors, colleagues and lifetime friends. Of all the people who inspired and supported the project along the way, my greatest debt is to my supervisors, Yvonne Galligan and Debbie Lisle, who offered feedback and encouragement for the thesis that laid the foundation for this book. Special acknowledgements are due to other colleagues and friends who also inspired my thinking and cheered for this project. Heartfelt thanks for their continuous support and friendship throughout these years to Shinhyung Choi, Merita Zecović, Laura Mills, Rowan Lubbock and Paddy McQueen. I am thankful to others who read and offered comments on my work at various stages, Roz Goldie, Sara Clavero, Danielle Roberts, Sasha Roseneil, Cynthia Cockburn, Allison McCulloch and Siobhan Byrne, as well as Cathal McCall and Miranda Alison who examined my Ph.D. thesis. Giulia Carabelli has inspired me and encouraged me to finally put the manuscript into shape, taking the time and trouble to read my work on many occasions and offering endless reassurance. A special mention to Yvonne Galligan for her continuous support and guidance in navigating post-PhD life.

Since my involvement as a co-convenor of the BISA South East Europe working group, I have been lucky to be part of a network of great scholars. I thank my colleagues in the convening team, Catherine Baker, Daniela Lai and Natalie Martin, for the inspiring conversations, research and ideas we are able to share. I also wish to thank the amazing activists of Belfast Feminist Network and Alliance for Choice in Belfast. When writing this book, I realised how much you have enriched my relationship to feminist activism and taught me about intersectional politics as practice.

In Bosnia I was overwhelmed with the generosity of the many wonderful people whom I met along the way, including Elma Tataragić, Lejla Somun-Krupalija, Esther G. Fransioli, Linda Johansson, Melina Sadiković, Valentina Pellizzer, Danijela and the Crvena activists. I thank Jakov Čaušević and Sanja Rašević, as collaborators and friends, for their invaluable help with translations and with arranging interviews. I thank Sandra Dukić for allowing me to include her artwork in the book. I thank Mela Žuljević and the ABART team for research support, for allowing me to include photos from the project “Recollecting Mostar” in the book, as well as for friendship.

I was able to complete this manuscript at the Institute for International Conflict Resolution and Reconstruction at Dublin City University. I am thankful to Ken McDonagh and John Doyle for hosting my fellowship and fostering this project. I thank my colleagues at the Institute and in the School of Law and Government for welcoming me at DCU and, especially, Aurelie Sicard, Paola Rivetti, Erika Biagini, Tajma Kapic, Maira Zeinilova and Jules Gaspard for friendship and companionship.

I am lucky to be surrounded by the love of my family and friends in my hometown, Sardinia, Dublin/Kildare, Liverpool and Belfast. My parents, Giovanna Frau and Gianni Deiana, have offered unconditional support and love. All you have taught me stood me in good stead as I embarked on the project. No words can describe how much Gordon Kavanagh has done through his care, love and endless support. Thank you for always believing I could do this.
