This project began life as a doctorate all too long ago, in 1982, when I was fresh from having been inspired by Professor Terry Ranger's third-year undergraduate special subject on the African experience in colonial Zimbabwe. It was Professor Ranger who first encouraged me to look at the history of the Rhodesian railway system. However, as will become clear to readers, my main intellectual debt is owed to Ian Phimister. I have trailed in his historiographical slip-stream over the past decade.

I would like to thank the following institutions for the assistance which they have given me in the course of my research: the National Archives of Zimbabwe, Harare; the National Archives of Zambia, Lusaka; the National Railways of Zimbabwe Museum, Bulawayo; Rhodes House, Oxford; the Public Record Office, Kew; the British Newspaper Library, Colindale.

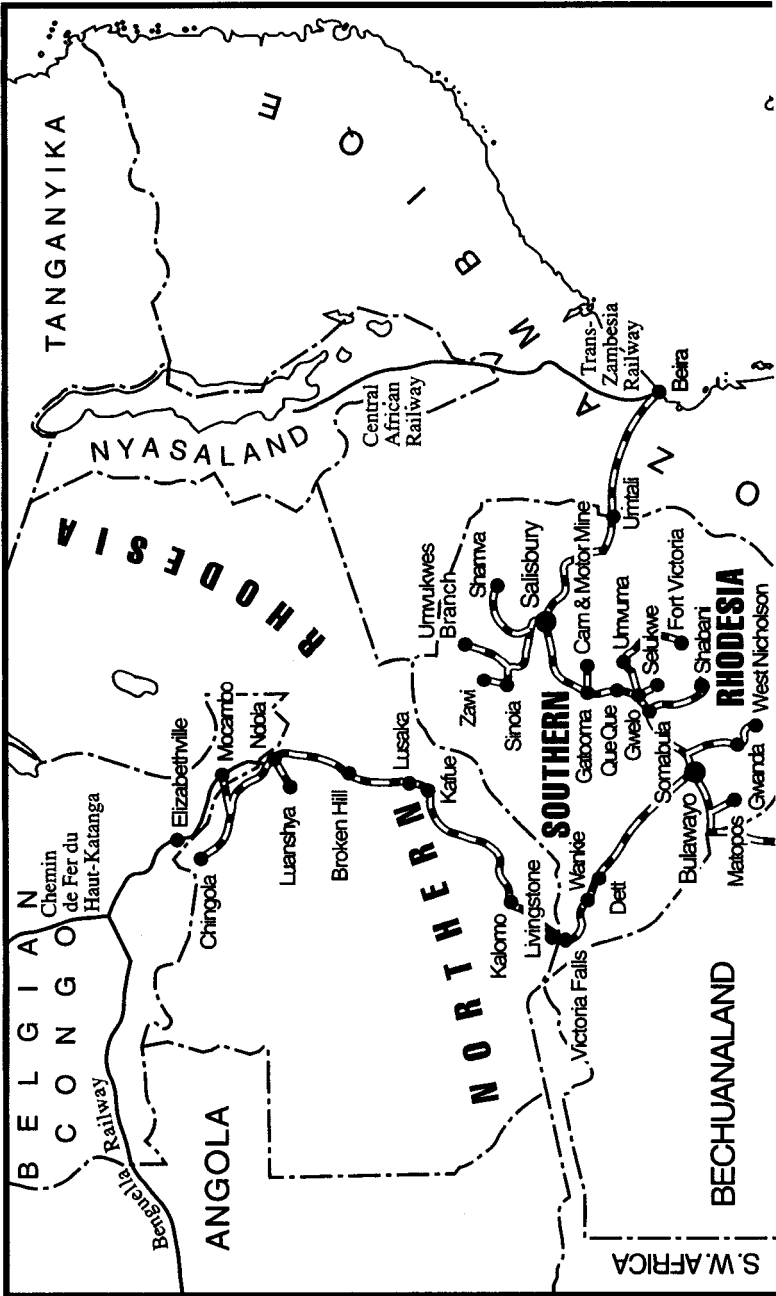

My thanks also go to St Antony's College, Oxford, where I was a post-graduate student between 1982 and 1986. I would also like to thank Stanley Trapido, who was a critical but supportive supervisor of the doctorate. Ackson Kanduzwa was generous with his time in Lusaka and stimulating in his academic work on issues with which I was also concerned. Finally, I would like to offer grateful thanks to the Isobel Thornley Bequest, which awarded a grant towards the cost of publication of this book.

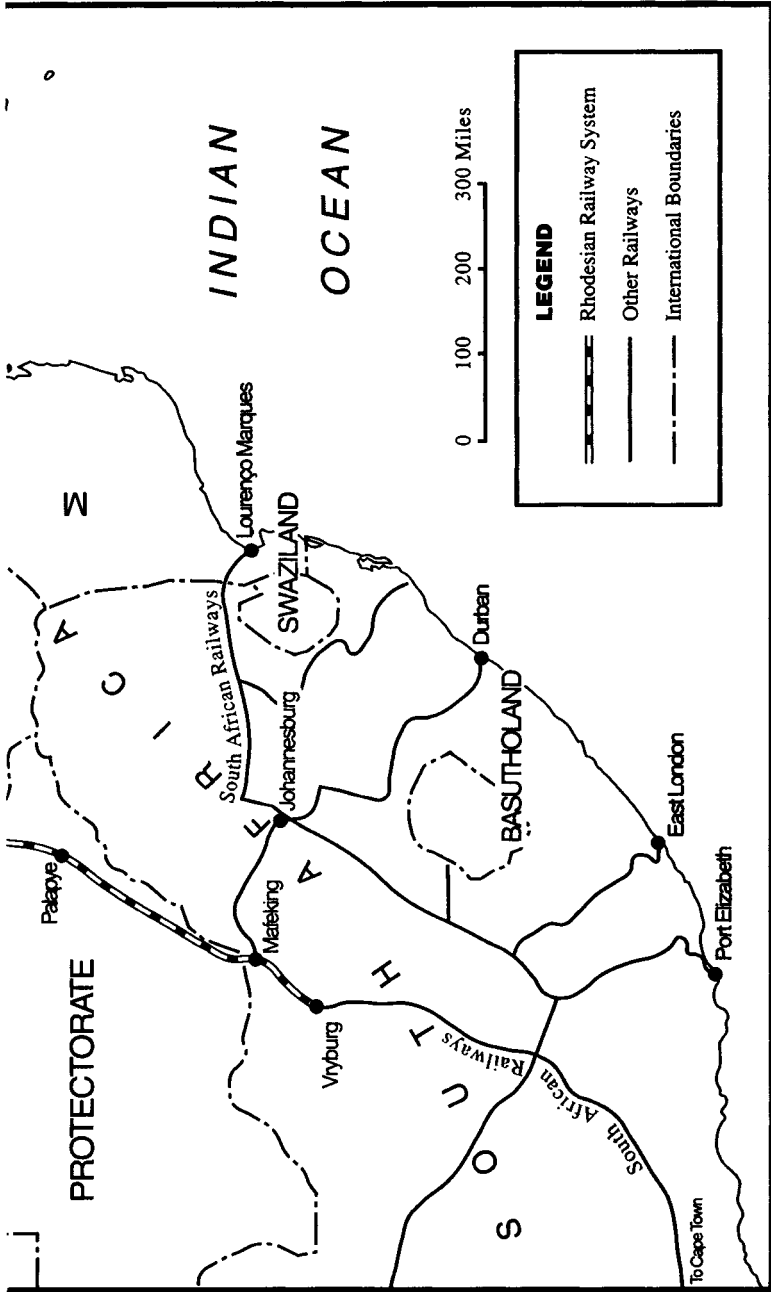

When it comes to thanking friends for their support and solidarity over the years, it is hard to know where and with whom to begin. Invidious as it is, I feel compelled to thank the following people in particular: Andy Kilmister, Matthew Lockwood, Jeremy Krikler, Donna Pankhurst, Paul Meehan, Richard Parry, Pete Phillips, Kersten England, Avril Danczak, Tracy Parr, Andy Mawson, Anne McMurdie, Saul Dubow and Patricia Hayes. Also impossible to put into words adequately is the gratitude which I owe my parents for their encouragement and support. I dedicate this book to Suzan Quilliam, whose patience and love throughout has been immeasurably important to me, and to our daughter, Nancy.
