All books are, to some extent at least, collective efforts. This is probably more true of this book than of most. The Meaning of Race is the product of almost a decade of discussion and debate with friends and colleagues, most of whom it would be impossible to name in an acknowledgement such as this. I would like to thank in particular Frank Furedi, James Heartfield and Naseema Khan for their generosity with both their time and their ideas. Marek Kohn read early drafts of this book even as he was working on his own, The Race Gallery. Steve Jones, Robin Cohen and Farekh Ahmed all provided valuable comments on various chapters. Richard Ings was of great assistance with the French material. My thanks to them all.

Throughout the book I have borrowed freely from the work of various authors – Robert Miles’ critique of the race relations paradigm, Maxim Silverman’s analysis of race in French political discourse, Robin Blackburn’s study of slavery, Eric Hobsbawm’s history of nineteenth-century nationalism, Douglas Lorrimer’s examination of race and class in Victorian England, Daniel Pick’s investigation of the idea of degeneration, George Stocking’s unearthing of the history of anthropology, Tzvetan Todorov’s discussion of the relationship between universalism and particularism, Aijaz Ahmad’s dissection of poststructuralism. Few of these authors – perhaps none of them – will agree with all my arguments in this book. I hope, however, that they will find in The Meaning of Race a useful addition to the discussion and debate around many of these themes.

Frances Arnold and Catherine Gray, my editors at the publishers, provided support and encouragement throughout the project.

Finally my thanks go to Kate Lowe, without whose loving companionship the writing of this book would have seemed so much more of a burden.
