Here we all are. A decade or so into the triumphant return of the bicycle to our cities as transport. Cities around the world are wondering what to do and how to do it. In the global narrative, there are cities that inspire and cities that still fail to get it. What is the state of the urban bicycle nation? Where is the fence lowest, and where are there imposing walls? In order to understand where we are—and where we are headed—let's look at some of the primary challenges our cities face.
