Acknowledgments

I had a blast writing this book primarily because it involved having discussions with some of the brightest, most inspirational people in the country: those who have seeded the new industry of real estate crowdfunding—whether it was their intent to or not. Naturally, therefore, I start by thanking those I spoke to for this book and who shared with me their incredible stories: David Weild IV, Jenny Kassar, Dina Ellis Rochkind, Doug Rand, Woodie Neiss, Ben Miller, Eve Picker, Ian Ippolito, Jason Fritton, Jilliene Helman, Harold Hofer, Nav Athwal, and Andy Green. Thanks also to Rod Turner at Manhattan Street Capital for supplying some amazing market data that underscores the dominance of the real estate industry as the primary beneficiary of JOBS Act regulations.

Though it may seem an unlikely facet of writing a book, there were some technical and communication challenges for which I am most grateful to Nichole Elliott, Judy Mahan, and Cory Karpin for their assistance each time I invaded their offices. Thanks to editor Cindy Draughon, and particularly to Sharon Goodman for her detailed feedback on the introduction and conclusion sections when I most needed it. Tula Weis and Jacqueline Young are, as before, great partners who make working with Palgrave Macmillan a tremendous pleasure.

Thanks are also due to my friends for their encouragement, bordering though it sometimes did on disbelief that I should be writing another book: CT Bell for always being prepared to lubricate the wheels of thought with me, Quintin Lever despite his united approach to crowds, and Adam Herz for the courteous epithets with which he always addresses me.

Most of all, thanks Debbie for having the confidence that I will, eventually, get it done, and to Oliver, Simon, and Felix, who will have to read the rest of the book to discover if they are mentioned a third time.
