ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I would like to thank many different communities who helped me produce this book. I would like to begin by thanking all of those who critiqued President Trump during 2016 and 2017. Although many of those writers would not agree with the specific arguments that I make in this book, I nevertheless respect their efforts and their recognition that something was not quite right as we were all inundated with Trumpian tweets and executive orders. I would also like to express my thanks and gratitude to the 16 graduate students who took my fall, 2017 critical research methods class in the Department of Communication at the University of Utah. They put up with my own archive fever and most of my eccentricities. These graduate students respectfully listened to my PowerPoint presentation on Donald Trump, Pershing and “pig bullets” that I presented just days after the 2017 terrorist attack on Barcelona. This was the event that sparked my interest and made me realize just why we needed a critical book that delved into archival presences and absences. I would also like to thank the chair of my Department, Danielle Endres, and our new Dean in the College of Humanities, Stuart Culver, who have always been supportive of my previous work.

The anonymous reviewer who read several drafts of this Pivot book did more than his or her fair share of critiquing when he/she pointed out key issues that needed to be addressed, literatures on the Moro that needed to be included, and assertions that needed to either be supported or taken out. Reviewers from other disciplines are oftentimes intolerant when they read critiques involving polemical approaches that are written by those who do not share their disciplinary views. This was not the case here, where the external reviewer provided detailed, fair, and very helpful guidance that pushed me to constantly revise drafts of this book. Although I am responsible for the final product this anonymous reviewer, who will probably not agree with everything that I have to say about American archives, nevertheless went out of their way to strengthen this manuscript. This is the type of constructive criticism, that sharing of the “life of the mind,” that comes from scholars in the academy who appreciate the work of others and who at times agree to disagree.

Last, but certainly not least, I want to thank Michelle Chen and John Stegner at Palgrave, who helped me immensely as I conceptualized this book and wrote various chapters. Michelle was supportive from the very outset of the publishing process while John helped with everything from the selection of images to making sure that I followed the necessary publication procedures.

I could not have published this book without their help.
