ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I would like to thank the dedicated people who helped me in my convoluted way to arrive at the contents of this book. Any mistakes are my own.

To the staff at the Institute of Local Government Studies (INLOGOV), University of Birmingham, 2006–2008. In particular, John Raine, Steven Griggs, Chris Skelcher, Martin Willis, Steve Rogers, Alan Lawton, Annie Rubienska and Tony Bovaird.

To the staff at the Centre for Systems Studies, Hull University Business School, 2012–2016. In particular, Amanda Gregory, Alberto Franco, Gerald Midgley and Angela Espinosa.

To those people who were so helpful with my doctoral research:

Governance experts: Jonathan Carr-West, Jake Chapman, Michael Coughlin, Mark Edgell, Graeme McDonald, Raheel Mohammed, Debbie Simpson, Neill Bennett, Kathryn Boulton, Martin Fox, Vanessa Grant, Ian Stephenson, Ratna Taylor and Mags Young.

Academic experts (complexity, systems thinking, management science): Peter Checkland, Colin Eden, Raul Espejo, Robert Geyer, Philip Haynes, Rebecca Herron, Michael C. Jackson, David C. Lane, Gerald Midgley, Martin Reynolds, John Seddon, Ralph Stacey and Jennifer Wilby.

Further invaluable help and guidance from the originators of approaches contained within the book, particularly Werner Ulrich, Gerald Midgley, Gareth Morgan, John Friend, David Snowden, Patricia Shaw and John Seddon.

To those who have endeavoured and continue to endeavour to find a way to guide and choose appropriately from a range or sequence of approaches, particularly Michael C. Jackson, Gerald Midgley, Martin Reynolds and Bob Williams.

Professional societies play a significant role in supporting such endeavours: the British Academy of Management, the Social Research Association and the International Society for the Systems Sciences. I was privileged to work on an Operational Research Society Public Policy initiative with John Friend, Rob Solly, Frances Abraham, Jonathan Rosenhead, Ian Mitchell, Brendan Hickling, Rob Angell and Gavin Blackett.

Thanks to those who have, with a good spirit, helped guide, encourage and inform me in writing my book: Jemima Warren and Oliver Foster at Palgrave Macmillan.

Sincere thanks to Robert Geyer of Lancaster University for his positive encouragement and advice over many years and for providing me with my first opportunity to become an author as a late-career ‘pracademic’. He stopped me from giving up what has frequently seemed like an impossible task that has driven me for most of my career and particularly the last ten years.

Much love and thanks to my family who are the most important thing of all to me.
