Radical Theologies and Philosophies is a call for transformational theologies that break out of traditional locations and approaches. The rhizomic ethos of radical theologies enable the series to engage with an ever-expanding radical expression and critique of theologies that have entered or seek to enter the public sphere, arising from the continued turn to religion and especially radical theology in politics, social sciences, philosophy, theory, cultural, and literary studies. The post-theistic theology both driving and arising from these intersections is the focus of this series.

PREFACE

Since my return to studies as a mature student, I have been reading the queen of sciences as the critical constant in pursuit of knowledge. Whether conspicuous or concealed, ostentatious or reserved, decisive or tentative, it unquestionably persists in reflection across a myriad of milieus. One of the many that drew my attention—and I do not purport to be a master of any—were its materialist incarnations full of daring and exciting contemplations. Originally my doctoral thesis, the book before the reader is an attempt to appropriate them in pursuit of a theology that wants to learn just as Aquinas wanted to learn from Arab philosophy. Its translation into a manuscript has in no small way been a journey of remembering the grounding and elan of my research into materialist theology.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

I should like to thank a few people: Stephen N. Williams who first encouraged me to undertake this project, Ralph Norman who supervised the doctoral thesis, Ward Blanton and Andrew Hass, who advised me to turn it into a book, and the editorial team at Palgrave Macmillan who made it happen. Last but not least, Slavoj Žižek for his afterword—hvala!

Part of the introduction was first published in International Journal of Theology and Philosophy (January 2019), under the title, ‘Critical Theology: Why Hegel Now?’. It is reprinted here with the permission of the journal, available here: <https://doi.org/10.1080/21692327.2019.1581654>.
