The International Series on Public Policy - the official series of International Public Policy Association, which organizes the International Conference on Public Policy - identifies major contributions to the field of public policy, dealing with analytical and substantive policy and governance issues across a variety of academic disciplines. A comparative and interdisciplinary venture, it examines questions of policy process and analysis, policy-making and implementation, policy instruments, policy change & reforms, politics and policy, encompassing a range of approaches, theoretical, methodological, and/or empirical. Relevant across the various fields of political science, sociology, anthropology, geography, history, and economics, this cutting edge series welcomes contributions from academics from across disciplines and career stages, and constitutes a unique resource for public policy scholars and those teaching public policy worldwide. All books in the series are subject to Palgrave's rigorous peer review process: <https://www.palgrave.com/gb/demystifying-peer-review/792492>

The idea of design is to link together values, models of causation, and the choice of instrumentation so that better choices can be made
(Linder and Peters 1987, 468)

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

This book is a product of a two-year research funded by FLACSO Ecuador through the grant #IP973. We are particularly thankful to our institution for this support. During the fieldwork we also benefited from the logistical support of the Energy Program at El Colegio de Mexico and the Department of Political Science at the University of Sao Paulo. We would like to express our special thanks to Isabelle Rousseau, José Luis Mendez and Adrián Gurza for their collaboration.

The preliminary results were presented during two meetings at the International Public Policy Association and during the monthly seminar held by the Comparative Policy Analysis Lab at FLACSO. We are extremely grateful to B. Guy Peters, Derek Beach and Mike Howlett for taking time to read our working papers and for making us accurate and inspiring suggestions. We also thank our students from the Lab for their relentless curiosity and their patience in testing our theories and methods on their own research, thereby providing us invaluable feedbacks to improve the policy design framework.

ABOUT THE AUTHORS

Guillaume Fontaine is a senior researcher at FLACSO Ecuador. He graduated from the University Paris 3 and Sciences-Po (Paris), where he specialized in comparative policy analysis. He coordinates the Public Accountability Project, a collective research about public accountability deficits in various Latin American countries. He has published extensively on social environmental conflicts and democratic governance in Latin America.

Cecilia Medrano Caviedes is an analytical economist with a multidisciplinary background. She graduated from Sciences-Po (Paris) and The London School of Economics, where she specialized in the political economy of natural resources and the governance of extractive industries. She has been a consultant for the Natural Resource Governance Institute, Ciudadanos por la Transparencia, the Venezuelan Ministry of Finance, and the UNESCO.

Iván Narváez is a senior researcher at FLACSO Ecuador. He graduated from the University Simon Bolivar (Quito), where he specialized in environmental law and comparative constitutionalism. He has been CEO of the Environmental Protection Unit at Petroecuador. He has published extensively about indigenous rights and environmental governance in the Amazon region.
