Acknowledgments

There are several people who have helped to make this book possible, from its earliest conception to the final page. First and foremost, I want to thank my original "editor-in-chief," my dad, who has been reading my writing, and improving it, for 30 years. Few books are written without the support, time, and participation of family members. My wife, Allison, read and re-read pages, and kept her sense of humor as I delved deeper into hate websites in our living room. My mother, who without fail could always help me find the right word. I also want to acknowledge the valuable input that I was given along the way from Ephrem, Jillian, Liam, and Marvin and Sherry. I am also grateful for the academic support and encouraging research environment that I receive from my Communication Studies colleagues at Pace University; Emilie Zaslow, Barry Morris, Satish Kolluri, Mary Ann Murphy, Marcella Szablewicz, Seong Jae Min, and Aditi Paul. Toward to the development and publication of this book, I want to sincerely thank my editor at Palgrave Macmillan, Shaun Vigil, and assistant editor, Glenn Ramirez, as well as my two reviewers whose collective suggestions helped to advance this work. Additionally, I can trace some of the earliest origins of this book to bits of papers that I wrote, and courses taken, at Howard University's Mass Communication & Media Studies Ph.D. Program. To that end, I wish to thank my teachers, Carolyn Byerly, Anju Chaudhary, and Barbara Hines. Finally, I want to acknowledge my grandparents, Cecilie and Joseph Klein, who were survivors of the Auschwitz and Dachau concentrations camps. My grandmother documented her own experiences in the Holocaust in her memoir Sentenced to Live. In it, Samuel Pisar begins the Preface by saying: "Soon history will speak with the impersonal voice of researchers, scholars and intellectuals; at worst, with the malicious voice of demagogues, revisionists and falsifiers." Those words, like my grandmother's story to follow, have always stuck with me. While I now represent that "voice of researchers," I have tried to produce a study that is not impersonal in tone, or twice-removed from its subject matter, but rather open and engaging in its attempt to educate others about the modern-day face of bigotry.
