In the twenty first century, literary criticism, literary theory, historiography and cultural studies have become intimately interwoven, and the formerly distinct fields of literature, society, history, and culture no longer seem so discrete. The Early Modern Cultural Studies series encourages scholarship that crosses boundaries between disciplines, time periods, nations, and theoretical orientations. The series assumes that the early modern period was marked by incipient processes of transculturation brought about through exploration, trade, colonization, and the migration of texts and people. These phenomena set in motion the processes of globalization that remain in force today. The purpose of this series is to publish innovative scholarship that is attentive to the complexity of this early modern world and bold in the methods it employs for studying it.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

A lot of people were patient enough to read the less than intelligent first drafts of this book. My most sincere thanks to the members of the professional development writing group of Brittain postdoctoral fellows at Georgia Tech, including Rebecca Weaver, Aaron Kashtan, Patti Taylor, Joy Bracewell, Julie “I want to have your word babies” Hawk, Jon “I use the word fungible in regular conversation like it’s no big deal” Kotchian and Rachel “put some jelly on your shoulder” Dean-Ruzicka. Special thanks to Rachel and Jon, who basically read the entire manuscript—it’s stupid how much I love the two of you.

Thanks to my parents, Margaret and Garry, and my sister, Julia, for telling me for practically my whole life that I’m smart. How weird is it that my first book is an encomium to stupidity? Remember you’re the ones who put that VHS copy of Dumb and Dumber in my stocking one Christmas, so this whole thing is really your fault.

My most sincere and serious thanks to Palgrave Macmillan for accepting this book into its wonderful Early Modern Cultural Studies series.

Chapter 2, “Middling through Somehow: Queer Temporality and the Disaster Meme,” first appeared in Rhizomes: Cultural Studies in Emerging Knowledge, issue 26 (2014).

A version of Chap. 3 first appeared as “Folly 2012: The Campaign for Foolishness in Twenty-first-Century Politics” in PMLA 130.2 (2015): 299–314.
