ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

On a spring day in 2008, I received an email that changed my life. An anonymous professor had recommended that I apply to work as a tutor in the Learning Resource Center and, as goes the cliché, this book represents the culmination of that simple missive. My sincere thanks then goes to Ann Stenglein, Maureen McBride, Bill Macauley, and Jackie Grutsch McKinney for giving me the opportunity to explore this path. I thank you all for your guidance, support, and embodiment of what it means to be a successful writing center practitioner.

Thanks to all those in Muncie and Massachusetts who supported me throughout this process, especially Nicki Baker, Kat Greene, Morgan Gross, Kelsie Walker, Alison Klein, and Katie DeLuca. Particular thanks too to Rory Lee and Paul Gestwicki for their invaluable comments on early versions of this project. And Jennifer Grouling—you have been my cheerleader since day one. Thank you for everything.

Much appreciation is due to Shaun Vigil and the editorial team at Palgrave for their enthusiasm about and commitment to this project, as well as to the two reviewers whose comments demonstrated the truly rare combination of astuteness, utility, and kindness. Everything about this process has run counter to the standard angst-ridden narratives of academic publication (many of which I chronicle here!) and for that I feel both incredibly fortunate and enormously grateful. On this note, significant appreciation too is due to the administrator-scholars who shared their perspectives with me for Chap. 5. This work benefits immeasurably from their honesty and insights.

And, finally, thank you to my family, especially my exceptionally supportive in-laws (John, Judy, Kate, Sara, and Bailey), my sister, and my parents, Lisa, Bob, and Vikki. You have all done so much to help me make it to this point. And, to Tom, thanks always for being my adventure and for keeping me in socks.
