

New Security Challenges

Series Editor

The last decade has demonstrated that threats to security vary greatly in their causes and manifestations and that they invite interest and demand responses from the social sciences, civil society, and a very broad policy community. In the past, the avoidance of war was the primary objective, but with the end of the Cold War the retention of military defence as the centrepiece of international security agenda became untenable. There has been, therefore, a significant shift in emphasis away from traditional approaches to security to a new agenda that talks of the softer side of security, in terms of human security, economic security, and environmental security. The topical New Security Challenges series reflects this pressing political and research agenda.

ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Of all the people to whom I owe thanks, my partner Lisa Lawson deserves the biggest recognition. She has not only given me considerable amounts of love, patience and strength during the process of writing this book, she has also given me two beautiful daughters, Sophie and Isla, who were born as I began to write the final manuscript. This past year has been unbelievably emotional and exhausting for us all, but it has been all the more enjoyable for the light and curiosity Sophie and Isla have brought us. Here's to many more!

I'd also like to thank my family, and in particular my mother and father, for putting up with long periods of absence while I wrote the book.

This book grew out of Ph.D. research undertaken at the University of Manchester. During, and in the years since completing, my doctoral research I have accumulated a series of debts which I would like to recognise here.

In the first instance, I am extremely grateful to my supervisors Piers Robinson and Stephen Hutchings who not only provided me with considerable encouragement and excellent advice throughout the Ph.D., but also showed me what true academics should be: critically exacting, intellectually honest and genuinely committed to improving existing frameworks of knowledge.

Thanks should also go to the many friends and colleagues I've been lucky enough to work with at universities in Manchester, Liverpool, Sheffield and beyond: Katia Balabanova, Alex Balch, Martin Coward, David Hill, Francesca Gains, Pete Goddard, Emmanuel-Pierre Guittet, Peter Humphreys, Elizabeth Poole, Kay Richardson, Robert Spencer, Oliver Turner and Andreja Zevnik.

I would also like to thank the many journalists, editors and producers at the BBC who took time out of their busy schedules and agreed to be interviewed for the book. In particular, I'd like to thank Ben Brown, Jeremy Bowen, Gordon Corera, Mark Easton, Margaret Gilmore, David Jordan, Paul Lashmar, Aleem Maqbool, Jim Muir, Stephen Sackur, Keith Somerville and Peter Taylor. In addition, I would like to thank one BBC journalist who, for various reasons, could not be named in the final text.

A big thanks to all those who helped me during archival research at universities and institutions around England, Scotland and Wales: Rosalind Bell, David Henderson and Sarah Mannix at the Manchester University Media Centre; Kathleen Dickson at the British Film Archives; Andrew Hoskins and Matt Allen at the Adam Smith Research Foundation; Will McTaggart and colleagues at the North West Film Archive; Nick Mosdell at Cardiff School of Journalism, Media and Cultural Studies; Ben O'Loughlin at Royal Holloway; and, finally, Greg Philo and Colin MacPhearson at the Glasgow University Media Group.

Last, but certainly not least, a special mention also goes to my dog Henry for giving me a reason to get out of the house every day.

Earlier versions of some of the theoretical and case study material have been adapted from the following publications:
