The series will publish book-length studies, essay collections, and readers on sexualities and power, queer studies and class, feminisms and race, post-coloniality and nationalism, music, media, and literature. Traditional, transcultural, theoretically savvy, and politically sharp, this series will set the stage for new directions in the changing field. We will accept well-conceived, coherent book proposals, essay collections, and readers.

This book began a decade ago when Adriana Bergero agreed to serve as a mentor and director for my independent research. Under her guidance I immersed myself in Argentine cultural studies, learning from her intersectional, interdisciplinary approach to culture that opened up fascinating new questions and angles to pursue. In her classes and while writing my dissertation under her direction, I learned how to pry open cultural texts to reveal points of contact with legal, medical, labor, and gender histories; to appreciate the significance of public and private spaces, architecture, urban design, and technology; and to recognize the sensorial, the body, passions, emotions, the irrational, and everyday life as counter-hegemonic realms with radical transformative potential. Along with Adriana's exemplary teaching and scrupulous mentorship, my UCLA professors and readers Michelle Clayton, Jorge Marturano, and Héctor Calderón, as well as Horacio Legrás at UC-Irvine, provided essential inspiration, guidance, and feedback at different stages of the research process. I am extremely grateful that this team of professors and readers encouraged, inspired, and supported me in pursuing this book project.

My fascination with the turn of the twentieth century began in my classes at UNC-Chapel Hill with Juan Carlos González Espitia and María Salgado. I owe my initial appreciation for Latin American literature from the period to their exquisite teaching and mentorship, and I am extremely grateful that our academic paths crossed, however briefly.

Among other things, starting a book requires research, but seeing it to completion takes hefty doses of support and feedback from a trusted community. I am forever indebted to the many people who tirelessly listened to my ideas, read drafts, and cheered me on at different stages of the process, especially Rachel VanWieren at National University, Diana Schwartz at Wesleyan University, Gabriela Venegas at UCLA, Edward Chauca at College of Charleston, Samantha Garrett, Hilary Larson Danailova, and Alejandro Miranda. The community we created through long walks, excursions, empanadas, patacones, birria, and carmenere is irreplaceable. The short-lived Morgantown Book Club, with WVU colleagues Tania de Miguel Magro and Matthew Titolo, as well as Karleen West of SUNY Geneseo, was also pivotal for keeping the ball rolling through snow days, moves, and jet-setting travels, as was the unswerving support from Ángel Tuninetti.

My community at College of Charleston, where I brought the manuscript to completion, has been more supportive and influential than I could have imagined: particularly the mentorship of Sarah Owens, Susan Divine, and Emily Beck, the support of my writing partners Brittany Lehman and Jennifer Cavalli, and the editorial work of Maggie Boyd. Perhaps most important at the College of Charleston were conversations sustained with the Spanish majors who took my course “Performance y cultura popular en América Latina” and whose fresh energy invigorated my own approach to several parts of this book.

While not directly involved with the work for this book, I would like to recognize here my longest academic supporter and mentor, my inspiration to keep persisting, Sheri Spaine Long, Executive Director of AATSP. Countless women and I have been able to achieve diverse professional goals because of her tireless commitment to pull other women up with her.

In different moments, I received institutional support for research and writing from the Graduate Division of University of California, Los Angeles, the UCLA Department of Spanish and Portuguese’s Ben and Rue Pine Travel Award, and a Tinker Foundation Field Research Grant through the UCLA Latin American Institute. My writing was also supported by a Robert J. Elkins Foreign Language Development Grant from West Virginia University and a Faculty Research and Development Grant from the College of Charleston. I am extremely grateful to the Biblioteca Nacional de la República Argentina for access to vast archives of popular print media, and to Guido Herzovich at CONICET for showing me around Buenos Aires.

I am thankful for the opportunity to present and discuss different portions of this book at the conferences of Latin American Studies Association, Nineteenth-Century Studies Association, UCLA comparative literature graduate students, American Association of Teachers of Spanish and Portuguese, and University of Chicago graduate students. I am especially thankful to Bethany Beyer at Brigham Young University, Traci Schick at University of Chicago, Mir Yarfitz at Wake Forest University, Rocío del Águila at Wichita State University, María Alejandra Zambrano at Universidad San Francisco de Quito, and Vanesa Miseres at University of Notre Dame for the stimulating conversations at these conferences.

I would like to thank my editor at Palgrave Macmillan, Shaun Vigil, for enthusiastically endorsing this project and for his efficient, supportive work. I am also grateful to the anonymous readers who offered such generous and helpful suggestions.

This book is dedicated to the voracious readers in my family—Edward, Maya, and my mother Gwen—without whose encouragement and support this book would not exist.
