

Australian Animation

“The fact that Lienors and Dan Torre spent over a decade researching and documenting this history is testament to their expertise as animators and scholars; and it is an important aspect that adds to the quality and authenticity of their writing. Their seminal work positions and clarifies Australia’s cultural evolution, innovation and unique practice.”

Fig. 2.2	Portrait of Harry Julius (1918)	12
Fig. 2.3	Still frames from Cartoons of the Moment (Harry Julius) These films featured a very sophisticated application of the cut-out animation technique	16
Fig. 2.4	Detail of Australian patent for cut-out animation technique, Harry Julius 1918	17
Fig. 2.5	Promotional image for Cartoon Filmads, c.1920	19
Fig. 2.6	Storyboards produced by Cartoon Filmads in preparation for the Lux Soap animated cinema advertisement (c.1920)	22
Fig. 2.7	Promotional literature for Cartoon Filmads, showing the various stages of the studio's production	24
Fig. 2.8	Print ad by Cartoon Filmads that accompanied the animated film advertisement for the same product, 1919	25
Fig. 3.1	An early drawing by Pat Sullivan (as Pat O'Sullivan) c.1908 (Image courtesy State Library of NSW)	33
Fig. 3.2	Title card for Charlie Chaplin series (1918–1919) depicting two Felix-like black cats. This series was produced prior to Feline Follies (1919), which is often regarded as the first 'Felix' film	38

	grab from Feline Follies , late 1919. There is a marked similarity between the design of these two cats	39
Fig. 3.4	Frame grab from Feline Follies (1919) which features the Australian vernacular, “Mum”	40
Fig. 3.5	Frame grab from a later Felix cartoon which shows the more rounded styling of the Felix films produced after 1922	41
Fig. 4.1	Cover of sheet music for the theme song, “I’m Willie the Wombat” that accompanied the release of Eric Porter’s short film, Waste Not Want Not (1939). An accompanying dance step, The Wombat Waddle, was also created and promoted throughout a number of Australian dance halls	61
Fig. 4.2	Image, featuring Willie Wombat (left) and Bennie Bear (right) from the accompanying book to Eric Porter’s short film, Waste Not Want Not (1939)	63
Fig. 4.3	Screen logo for Eric Porter Studios, proudly noting the studio’s location in Sydney, Australia. The logo also depicts a movie camera silhouette that has an uncanny visual connection to the silhouette of the Walt Disney character, Mickey Mouse	66
Fig. 4.4	Frame grab from the short animated film Bimbo’s Auto (Porter 1954), exhibiting a somewhat retro style, reminiscent of the 1940s	67
Fig. 4.5	Frame grabs from the educational animated short film, A Dairy-Land Romance (Owen Brothers, 1954). a depicts two very well-bred bovines, which speak in an unmistakably crisp British accent (which was the broadcast standard in Australia in the 1950s). b depicts a young bull, replete with flashy clothes, who lacks such proper breeding, and subsequently speaks in a much broader Australian accent. This film was animated by Bruce Petty, and represents a stark contrast to the much freer illustrative styling of his later independent animated films	70
Fig. 4.6	Image by Serge Sesin of Australian animals (1952)—intended as a pre-cursor to a planned animated film	73
Fig. 4.7	Frame grab from The Magic Trumpet (Dusan Marek 1962), a cut-out animated film that utilises a surprisingly eclectic range of materials	76
Fig. 5.1	Frame grab from the animated television series, Arthur! And the Square Knights of the Round Table (1966)	90
Fig. 5.2	Frame grab from the animated television series, Captain Comet of the Space Rangers which utilised a hybrid of live-action model sets and cel animation	95
Fig. 5.3	Frame grab from the Freddo the Frog television series (1952)	99

Fig. 6.1	Frame grab from the original Marco Polo Junior versus The Red Dragon (Porter 1972) which showcases some of the elaborate background scenery used in the film	116
Fig. 6.2	Frame grab from the original Marco Polo Junior versus The Red Dragon (Porter 1972) shows a particularly engaging sequence in which the crashing waves momentarily metamorphose into menacing dragon formations	117
Fig. 6.3	Advertising sheet for the Australian release of the feature film, Marco Polo Junior versus The Red Dragon , highlighting the fact that it was an Eric Porter Studios production	124
Fig. 7.1	Frame grab from Dot and the Kangaroo (1977)	140
Fig. 8.1	Frame grab from Grendel Grendel Grendel (Alex Stitt 1980) showcasing both Stitt's strong sense of design and the omission of any black outlines around the character and background elements	153
Fig. 8.2	Frame grab from Grendel Grendel Grendel (Alex Stitt 1980) which further illustrates the bold character designs and the omission of linework around the characters. This approach also seemed to work well against a solid coloured background, as shown here	154
Fig. 8.3	Frame grab from Abra Cadabra (Alex Stitt 1983). Note the character on the right appears somewhat out of focus, due to the 3D optical processing	156
Fig. 10.1	Frame grab from The Magic Pudding (2000)	186
Fig. 11.1	Frame grab from A Photo of Me (Dennis Tupicoff 2017)	223
