Acknowledgements

Acknowledgement that one's thought and writing are virtually a confluence of many influences is incumbent upon the author who would be honest. Like Jastrow's "duck-rabbit" seen in one way, a book indicates the labors of its writer; seen in another and equally legitimate manner, it signifies a multitude to whom its author is indebted.

More than to any other Husserl scholar, I am indebted to Professor Theodore de Boer. My dialogue with his The Development of Husserl's Thought has never ceased to be rewarding.

I am grateful to my teachers at Boston University — Professors H. H. Oliver, W. Marx Wartofsky, J. N. Findlay, Erazim Kohák, and Bernard Elevitch — in whose courses my thought and expression were nurtured, cultivated, and weeded. Thanks are due to Professors Kohák and Oliver for recommending my dissertation to Kluwer Academic Publishers and to Professor Oliver for remarkable generosity and continued collaboration. Special thanks to Professor Robert Cohen for his kind interest in my work and for his advocacy and delivery of my manuscript to Kluwer Academic Publishers. The enthusiasm of Professor Judson Webb for this project at its inception, and his willingness to share his research concerning Husserl and Hilbert, was a valued inspiration at a critical time.

I have much appreciated the kindness and good will of Professor S. IJsseling of the Husserl-Archives, Leuven, in this my first experience with the publishing process.

Thanks are also due my friend, Dr. Gary Zabel, Socratic analyst and interlocutor par excellence; I am indebted to him for many aporetic conversations on Husserl, and for support through the most trying of times. I am grateful as well to Mr. Douglas Anderson, lover of Sartre, for generous friendship, and to Mr. Lance Carden, to whom spirited argument only draws me closer. Many thanks to Connie and Warren Ogilvie for providing the opportunity for a very happy and stable home in which my dissertation might be written. I am inexpressibly grateful to Laura E.

Wiele, my mother, who has known and supported me longer than anyone and whose faith in me has often restored my faith in myself.

I am deeply indebted in innumerable ways to my wife and companion, Beverly Y. Cooper-Wiele, who has been more than meet help. She has done all of the things well for which wives are typically credited in their husband's books: deciphered, typed, edited, proof-read; all tirelessly and with a humor and perspective I often lacked. More important, her relentlessly critical intellect is both inspiration and ideal; she wields naturally what I do only with rather more effort.

Finally, I owe a large debt of gratitude to the late Professor Dr. Edmund G. Husserl. My engagement of his work has been unfailingly provoking, illuminating, and inspiring. It was a very happy coincidence that I defended my dissertation, rooted in his Habilitationsschrift of 1887, in the centenary year of that work. It is my sincerest hope that he would accept this essay as some small repayment of my intellectual debt to him.
