Scope

The purpose of this series is to foster the development of phenomenological philosophy through creative research. Contemporary issues in philosophy, other disciplines and in culture generally, offer opportunities for the application of phenomenological methods that call for creative responses. Although the work of several generations of thinkers has provided phenomenology with many results with which to approach these challenges, a truly successful response to them will require building on this work with new analyses and methodological innovations.

Introduction

§ 1. Remarks on the current status of the problematic	1
§ 2. The ontological formulation of the issues in controversy between Husserl and Heidegger necessarily precludes their non-partisan "phenomenological" exploration	3
§ 3. "Intentionality" in Husserl's and Heidegger's formulations of phenomenology comprises the focus of the present study. The philological and philosophical reasons for this focus	4
§ 4. Design of the treatise	7
§ 5. The contrast of the present study of intentionality in Husserl and Heidegger with Bernet's treatment of the problem	9

Part One

Husserl's Phenomenological Account of Intentionality

Introduction to Part One

§ 6. Preliminary considerations	15
---	----

Chapter One: Husserl's Phenomenological Method

§ 7. Introductory remarks	17
§ 8. Husserl's initial "critical" uncovering of lived-experiences	19
§ 9. Phenomenological reflection is not determined by the interiority of its object; the reflective "seeing of essences"	21
§ 10. The essence of the lived-experiences of the appearance, manner of appearing, and perception of something transcendent	22
§ 11. The essence of the lived-experiences of the appearance, manner of appearing, and perception of something immanent	24
§ 12. The methodological transition from the critical uncovering of the essences of lived-experiences to their phenomenologically pure apprehension	26
§ 13. Summary and transition	29

Chapter Two: The Intentionality of Logical Significance and Material Ontological Meaning

§ 14. Introductory remarks	32
--------------------------------------	----

§ 15. The intentionality of logical signification: the analytic status of the essence of logical categories and their intuition	33
§ 16. The epistemic essence of logical signifying: empty and fulfilled intentions	35
§ 17. The non-logical intentionality of synthetic cognition: its importance for the psychological Ἐποχή and reduction	36
§ 18. Actional and non-actional modes of intentionality	38
§ 19. The phenomenological clarification of the intentionality of synthetic cognition: the essential correlation between positing and positum manifested in the objective presentation of the experience of perceptual objects	39
§ 20. Summary and transition	42

Chapter Three: The intentionality of Psychologically Pure Consciousness

§ 21. Introductory remarks	44
§ 22. The phenomenological Ἐποχή of positional consciousness and the uncovering of its psychologically pure residuum	44
§ 23. The constitutional essence and eidos of psychically pure consciousness	47
§ 24. The essence and eidos of the non-actional intentionality of the world-horizon and its correlative non-conceptual consciousness	51
§ 25. The intentionality of worldly apperception as the necessary phenomenal background of the intentionality of the cogito	53
§ 26. Summary and transition	54

Chapter Four: The Intentionality of Transcendentally Pure Consciousness

§ 27. Introductory remarks	55
§ 28. The phenomenologically transcendental bracketing and Ἐποχή of the intentionality of the world-horizon: the initiation of the transcendental reduction to transcendently pure consciousness	56
§ 29. The initial appearance of transcendent time to reflection within the natural attitude	59
§ 30. The essence of the psychologically reduced phenomenon of the temporality of succession	61
§ 31. The essence of the psychologically reduced phenomenon of the time consciousness of succession	62
§ 32. The psychological essence of the temporality and time consciousness of simultaneity	63
§ 33. The eidetic overcoming of the essential horizontal limitation of phenomenological reflection on the essence of the psychologically reduced phenomenon of time: the immanent manifestation and intuitive ideation of ideas in the kantian sense	65

§ 34. The methodological uncovering of the object and subject poles of intentionality	66
§ 35. The phenomenologically transcendental bracketing and Ἐποχή of the time in which the intentionality of the world-horizon appears	67
§ 36. Summary and conclusion	71

Part Two

Heidegger's Phenomenological Account of Intentionality

Introduction to Part Two

§ 37. Preliminary considerations	81
--	----

Chapter Five: Heidegger's Concept of Phenomenology

§ 38. Introductory remarks	82
§ 39. Heidegger's unfolding of the formal structure of the question about the meaning of being; the provisional account of the related 'objects' of ontology: the being of entities and the meaning of being as such	83
§ 40. Unfolding the formal structure of the being question leads to the priority of investigating the being of the questioner	85
§ 41. The provisional account of the being of the questioner (Dasein) following clues provided by the formal structure of the question about the meaning of being; emergence of the task of fundamental ontology	86
§ 42. Heidegger's clarification of phenomenology within the context of the existential analytic: the preliminary concept of phenomenology	89
§ 43. The formal concept of phenomenon: its ordinary and phenomenological signification	92
§ 44. The concrete envisaging of the formal and deformed concepts of phenomenon; the phenomenological relevance of the ordinary concept of phenomenon	95
§ 45. The need for phenomenology's methodological mediation has its basis in the thematic 'objects' of ontology; the reciprocal relation of phenomenology and ontology as philosophy's way of determining and treating its 'object'	96
§ 46. Clarification of the mode of knowing operative in the preliminary concept of phenomenology: the a priori cognition of phenomenological reduction, construction and destruction	98
§ 47. Summary and transition	101

Chapter Six: The Phenomenological Inquiry into the Being of Intentionality

§ 48. Introductory remarks	103
§ 49. Heidegger's characterization of Husserl's understanding of intentionality as the structure of lived-experiences	104

§ 50. Heidegger's characterization of the way the a priori of intentionality is brought into relief from its exemplary ground in Husserl's understanding of intentionality: the transcendental and eidetic reductions	106
§ 51. The failure of Husserl's phenomenology to investigate the being characters of the intentional	107
§ 52. The return of Husserl's phenomenology to the idea of a theory of reason: its resultant inability to determine the being of lived-experiences in an original way	109
§ 53. Husserl's phenomenological understanding of the 'natural attitude' is only a semblance of man's natural way of being: its neglect of the necessary posing of the being question	111
§ 54. The inquiry into the being of intentionality requires the phenomenon of intentionality to be made into a problem	112
§ 55. The erroneous 'objectivizing' of intentionality	114
§ 56. The erroneous 'subjectivizing' of intentionality	115
§ 57. The manifestation of the natural meaning of the phenomenon of intentionality overcomes the problem of the subject-object relation, and points to the problem of transcendence	117
§ 58. The understanding of being implicit in the phenomenon of the natural meaning of intentionality	117
§ 59. The intentional discovery of entities is founded in the disclosedness of the being of entities	118
§ 60. Summary and transition	120

Chapter Seven: Being in the World Manifests Dasein's Original Transcendence

§ 61. Introductory remarks	122
§ 62. Perceptual knowing is a founded mode of being-in-the-world; the foundation of epistemology in the ontology of presence-at-hand	123
§ 63. Summary of the phenomenal results of Heidegger's analyses thus far which lead him to recast both phenomenology's basic field of research and the method by which it proceeds	125
§ 64. Heidegger's analysis of Dasein's existential way of being the 'there': the equiprimordial existentialia of the disclosedness of the unitary phenomenon of being-in-the-world	126
§ 65. Disposition as the existentiale disclosive of the 'that-it-is' of Dasein's way to be	127
§ 66. Original understanding as the existentiale disclosive of the pre-conceptual understanding of being manifested by Dasein's way to be	129
§ 67. Projection as an existentiale manifested by original understanding	130
§ 68. The understanding's appropriation of itself; interpretation (Auslegung)	132

§ 69. The projective unity of the phenomenal connection between the fore-structure of understanding and the 'as' structure of interpretation (Auslegung); the existentials of meaning as the formal existential framework of intelligibility as such	134
§ 70. The ontic and ontological basis of the circular manifestation of the structure of Dasein's interpretative understanding; the grounding of the ontological projecting of the existential interpretation guiding the existential analytic of fundamental ontology in the existentiell being of Dasein	135
§ 71. The problem of transcendence and being-in-the-world	137
§ 72. The transcendence of Dasein surpasses entities, and not the subject	139
§ 73. World as the 'toward which' of transcendence and the origin of both in freedom	141
§ 74. Summary and transition	143
 Chapter Eight: The Temporal Meaning of Transcendence
§ 75. Introductory remarks	146
§ 76. The ordinary understanding of time in terms of a sequence of nows; the manifestation of time in the phenomenal mode of semblance	147
§ 77. The datable structure of expressed time emerges on the basis of Dasein's relation to things, and not its thematic consciousness of time designations	148
§ 78. The origin of time designations (datability) in the modes of Dasein's existence; transcendence as the 'where' of the uttered characters of time	149
§ 79. The unity of original time; its manifestation in the ecstatic unity of the temporalization of temporality	150
§ 80. The analogical manifestation of the ecstatic horizon of the temporalization of temporality; world as the ecstematic unity of the ecstatic horizons of temporality	153
§ 81. Heidegger's exhibition of the unoriginal and derivative status of the intentionality of consciousness	154
§ 82. The ontic transcendence of intentionality manifests a semblance of the phenomenon of original transcendence	155
§ 83. Summary and conclusion	156

Part Three
The Confrontation of Husserl's and Heidegger's
Accounts of Intentionality

Introduction to Part Three

§ 84. Preliminary considerations	165
--	-----

Chapter Nine: The Phenomenological Method: Reflective or Hermeneutical?

§ 85. Introductory remarks	167
§ 86. Themmatization of Husserl's account of the 'necessity' motivating phenomenology's return to the matters themselves	167
§ 87. Themmatization of Heidegger's account of the 'necessity' motivating phenomenology's return to the matters themselves	169
§ 88. Themmatization of the phenomenal discrepancy in Husserl's and Heidegger's account of the necessity of the phenomenological return	171
§ 89. Themmatization of the philosophical 'orientation' guiding Husserl's understanding of phenomenology	172
§ 90. Themmatization of the philosophical 'orientation' guiding Heidegger's understanding of phenomenology	174
§ 91. The "Heideggerian" prerogative of a hermeneutically understood phenomenological method	176
§ 92. The "Husserlian" prerogative of a reflectively understood phenomenological method	178
§ 93. An attempt to mediate the methodological returns of the phenomenologies of Husserl and Heidegger: the isomorphism which emerges with respect to these returns when their "foreshortened" understandings of each other are taken into account	184
§ 94. The limit of the methodological isomorphism between the hermeneutical and reflective returns of phenomenology: the problem of reckoning with the divergent "matters themselves" of intentionality uncovered by each return	186
§ 95. Transition	187

Chapter Ten: Intentionality: An Original or Derived Phenomenon?

§ 96. Introductory remarks	189
§ 97. Themmatization of Husserl's account of the exemplary field which yields the intentional essence of both actionally and non-actionally modified lived-experiences	190
§ 98. Themmatization of Heidegger's account of the unoriginal phenomenal status of intentionality: his critique of Husserl's "epistemological" narrowing of this phenomenon and his subsequent unfolding of the natural meaning of intentionality	191

§ 99. The emergent heteromorphism of Husserl's and Heidegger's account of the 'matter itself' of intentionality	193
§ 100. The 'Heideggerian' prerogative of the unoriginal phenomenal status of intentionality	194
§ 101. The 'Husserlian' prerogative of the original phenomenal status of intentionality	197
§ 102. Phenomenology's most proper self-understanding cannot be at once hermeneutical and reflective	203
§ 103. The necessity of attempting to mediate the issue of the phenomenological originality of intentionality: the non-partisan "opening-up" of the phenomenon of intentionality within the hermeneutical and reflective methodological prerogatives	205
§ 104. The hermeneutical prerogative and the non-actional dimension of intentionality	205
§ 105. Two phenomenally distinct "sights" are at issue within the hermeneutical prerogative: the ontico-ontological and explicitly ontological hermeneutical circles	207
§ 106. The transcendental distinction determinative of, yet unaccounted for, by the hermeneutical circle	209
§ 107. The reflective prerogative of phenomenology and the problem of a concealed ontology	210
§ 108. Working out the issue of ontology and phenomenology requires a decision regarding the originality of the phenomenon of intentionality	212

Part Four

Discussion of the Conclusions

Introduction to Part Four

§ 109. Preliminary considerations	217
---	-----

Chapter Eleven: Gadamer's Assessment of the Controversy between Husserl and Heidegger

§ 110. Introductory remarks	220
§ 111. The immanentism inherent in Husserl's and Heidegger's foundational approaches to phenomenology according to Gadamer	221
§ 112. Gadamer's account of Husserl's unwarranted concept of immanence	222
§ 113. The philological and philosophical problems inherent in Gadamer's account of Husserl's unwarranted concept of immanence	223
§ 114. Gadamer's uncritical reliance on Heidegger's methodological immanentism	224
§ 115. The unthematized epistemic moment of the 'hermeneutical situation' in Heidegger and Gadamer following Heidegger	226

§ 116. The issue of whether Husserl’s and Heidegger’s phenomenological commitment to the phenomenological ideal of manifestation is determined by an unwarranted commitment to the ‘metaphysics of presence’ 228

§ 117. Gadamer’s philosophical hermeneutics do not escape nor account for the self-referentiality of the transcendental of Husserl’s and Heidegger’s formulations of phenomenology 229

Chapter Twelve: Ricoeur’s Attempted Rapprochement Between Phenomenology and Hermeneutics

§ 118. Ricoeur’s thesis of phenomenology and hermeneutics presupposing each other 231

§ 119. Ricoeur’s account of Husserl’s idealism 231

§ 120. Ricoeur’s account of Husserl’s alleged idealism has its basis in ontologism and the conflation of the psychological and transcendental reductions 232

§ 121. Ricoeur’s restriction of the essential character and scope of phenomenological reflection 234

§ 122. Ricoeur’s uncritical reliance of Heidegger’s distinction between ‘interpretation’ and ‘understanding’ renders problematical his account of the opposition between idealistic phenomenology and its hermeneutic critique 235

§ 123. Ricoeur’s account of the opposition between Auslegung and description, and the need for their dialectical mediation, is based in his unwarranted restriction of phenomenological intuition and description 236

Chapter Thirteen: Mohanty’s Account of the Complementarity of Descriptive and Interpretive Phenomenology

§ 124. Introductory remarks 239

§ 125. Mohanty’s account of the structural isomorphism between the theory of consciousness and the theory of Dasein 240

§ 126. Mohanty’s account of the complementarity of Heidegger’s methodological Auslegung and Husserl’s intentional explication is philologically questionable 241

§ 127. Mohanty’s account of the phenomenological basis for the self-critical complementarity of transcendental reflection and the hermeneutical circle 243

§ 128. Mohanty’s account of the dialectic of ‘reflection and reflected upon’ is itself grounded in transcendental reflection. The consequent phenomenologically reflective basis of the ‘circularity’ of the hermeneutical circle 244

Chapter Fourteen: Crowell's Account of Husserl's and Heidegger's Divergent Interpretations of Phenomenology's Transcendental Character
§ 129. Crowell's account of Husserl's and Heidegger's agreement regarding phenomenology's basic character	246
§ 130. Crowell's account of the basic opposition between Husserl's and Heidegger's interpretations of phenomenology's basic transcendental character	248
§ 131. Taking into account Heidegger's methodological immanentism yields transcendental reflection as the Arche and Telos of the 'showing itself from itself' of 'that which is'	249
Chapter Fifteen: Landgrebe's Critique of Husserl's Theory of Phenomenological Reflection
§ 132. Introductory remarks	251
§ 133. Landgrebe's account of the important distinction between psychological and phenomenological reflection	252
§ 134. Landgrebe's account of Husserl's phenomenologically reflective uncovering of the absolute being of transcendental subjectivity	253
§ 135. The full sense of the intentionality of transcendental subjectivity transcends Husserl's reflectively immanent characterization of its absolute being according to Landgrebe	254
§ 136. Landgrebe's argument against Husserl's representational theory of phenomenological reflection	255
§ 137. Landgrebe's account of the two senses of transcendental subjectivity: the reductively uncovered 'absolute' in Husserl's sense and the anonymous pre-reflective 'place' where the absolute is experienced	256
§ 138. The lack of phenomenal justification for Landgrebe's characterization of the status of the 'reflected upon' intentional object	257
§ 139. Landgrebe's misleading formulation of the centrality of the distinction between psychological and phenomenological reflection	258
§ 140. The pre-transcendental basis for the 'motivation' of phenomenological reflection in Husserl's critique of the empiricistic formulation of 'inner perception'	259
§ 141. Landgrebe's critique of the intentional status of the 'reflected upon' in Husserl's theory of phenomenological reflection presupposes the eidetic reduction accomplished by phenomenology's methodical reflections	260
§ 142. The eide of the succession of the intentionality of temporality and time-consciousness are not successive in Husserl's analyses	262
§ 143. Landgrebe's phenomenologically inappropriate characterization of the intentionality of temporal succession as successive is at the root of his misguided critique of Husserl's phenomenological theory of reflection	264
