I would like to dedicate this book to the women in my life. They have cheered me on, questioned me, argued with me, and inspired me at various stages of writing this book. Their help has reminded me of the importance of having a community and being able to rely on it. I would especially like to thank Cathy L. Jrade, who has been a mentor and an inspiration since I was a graduate student and who continues to guide and encourage me. A special thank you is in order to Anke Biendarra, whose friendship gave me strength, grounded me, prod- ded me, and gave me courage in moments of crisis. Her sharp readings of this text made it stronger. I also would like to thank Rebecca Atencio and Emanuelle Oliveira, who have been sounding boards, editors, and friends before, during, and after the writing of the book. Thanks are also in order to my colleagues Kathy McKnight and Tey Diana Rebolledo who have supported me since my arrival at the University of New Mexico. I also would like to thank Kathryn Sánchez, who read a version of the book’s proposal, and Marguerite Harrison and Regina Dalcastagnè, whose work on Luiz Ruffato has stirred my thoughts. Finally, I would like to thank Anna Nogar for the writing sessions in the library that kept me on track and for the Saturday morning spin classes that kept me sane.

Of course this book would also not have come about without some men. I would like to thank them as well: Idelber Avelar for his inspirational ideas; David W. Foster, whose NEH workshop on contemporary urban fiction was the first spark for this book; Severino Albuquerque and Luis Madureira for the intellectual exchanges they made possible by inviting me to Madison, WI; Anthony Pereira, for letting me see that political science does indeed have a place in literary analysis; Rich Wood, whose conversations about publishing and social sciences encouraged me and gave me a different perspective; Camillo Penna, who led me down the path of academia and whose stimulating intellectual conversations have refined the scope of the book; Nelson Vieira and Luiz Fernando Valente for their work on contemporary Brazilian fiction; and Alyosha Goldstein, who read and gave valuable feedback on one of the many versions of this book’s proposal.

I would also like to thank Luiz Ruffato, Fernando Bonassi, Ferrez, Marcelino Freire, Marcal Aquino, Flavio Carneiro, and Nelson de Oliveira for our conversations about Brazilian literature and Brazil’s social issues and for their works. Thanks also to Claudiney Ferreira for the invitations to the events sponsored by the Itaú Cultural.

Finally, I would like to thank my parents. Both have helped me through my journey and have instilled in me a desire to learn. Last but not least, I would like to thank the love of my life, my husband, Jeremy Lehnen. Without his patience, companionship, questions, readings of the book, wonderful cooking skills, and love I would not have been able to do what I have done.
